Math Games Building Vocabulary and Background Knowledge One of the most important areas to focus on during the summer is building vocabulary and background knowledge. I try to focus on content in science, math, or social studies that my students may have missed in the classroom. If I teach higher grades, this becomes even more important. Anything I can do to provide background knowledge or review is helpful. There are so many wonderful ways to use technology and multimedia resources with these goals in mind, but since access to equipment or the Internet can vary greatly from one summer to another, I have included a number of low-tech options as well! The good news is that I have found that hands-on math and science activities seem like a game for most elementary ELLs, especially if they come from a culture where that is not expected in the classroom – so rest assured that students can still have fun without lots of computer time and video. Books Non-fiction Picture, non-fiction, reference, text, or chapter books can be used to generate conversation and questions. Leveled social studies books with photos are great for reading and for total non-speakers. Fiction My students have also enjoyed the books listed below. Based on the content and text, you can ask questions about these readings that students can answer verbally or in their journals. One of my favorites is Ten Sly Piranhas: You may be able to find some fun songs and videos at BusSongs. A number of other good activities and websites are listed in Music and Language Learning. I collect mine from magazines or online photo websites – again, Google Images or National Geographic Photography. Games and Activities Vocabulary questions: I often have my students use a ticket to get in or out the door. To get the ticket, they must answer a question. These build social language as well as class "spirit" and students can participate without fear if they do not like competition. There are many books on the topic e. Everybody Wins by Jeffrey Sobel. Projects Craft projects with some meaning as opposed to coloring sheets and busy work can prove engaging for students. During these projects, students are listening and following directions; when they work together, they practice speaking. I do the following: They design a frame and give it to their parents on the last day. Short projects such as origami encourage listening to directions and student interaction to build social skills. Students paint their own pictures to accompany a story. This is a good way to check student comprehension of a story the class is reading, especially for beginners. I make my own playdough and have students make characters from the stories. I have started to borrow portable, flip-top DVD players from friends or their kids and use them for "virtual field trips. I have purchased those that directly relate to curriculum communities, the water cycle, life cycles, etc. When we have access to the Internet, computers, and SmartBoards, there is a lot out there to explore! Through their site, I have access to hundreds of digital media programs that I can show my students for free. Be sure to preview everything you use and choose what works best for your class each summer. Beyond the Classroom Field trips: Field trips can be a highlight of the summer – when you have the funding! These two places are part of our Social Studies curriculum. We had interpreters with us to help explain everything, and a year later, the students still mention what they learned on these trips. For newcomers, a field trip to their new school is quite valuable. This depends on accessibility and funding, but can make an important difference at the beginning of the school year. Visiting different areas of the school such as classrooms, the cafeteria, and main office and talking about what students will do in each place will boost their confidence in the fall. Follow-up activities to field trips may include journal writing, thank you notes also a cultural component , putting together a bulletin board of photos and mementos, or short discussions reviewing what students saw and learned. Cultural Experiences One of the best parts of summer school is the cultural component – after all, those 4th of July fireworks are interesting! For some great summer ideas, here is a unit on summer fun and safety from Judie Haynes at everythingESL. Culture also goes beyond holidays and celebrations. For students who have not yet attended classes during the school year, or have perhaps attended for only a few weeks, everything may be a new cultural experience, including:

Camp Cooper gives international campers the opportunity to learn English in a fully English speaking environment. Our counsellors all speak English fluently and the entire programme is taught and led in English. This means that international campers will learn English throughout the day; speaking with their friends during meals, taking part in activities and chatting to their friends in the cabin. This offers campers the chance to learn in an English speaking environment and whilst we offer English language lessons, as much learning is done outside of the classroom as in it! Our Camp Cooper Programme Includes: Andrews Exciting evening activities such as talent shows, dances, team challenges and many more Safe, picturesque location in the Scottish countryside Mix of nationalities, including English to ensure campers practice English with new international friends. Our qualified teachers will teach campers the class curriculum through games, songs and activities. We make sure that campers enjoy their learning experience and have fun in the classroom environment. We focus on campers learning to speak English fluently through building up their confidence and ensuring they constantly speak English throughout their time at Camp Cooper. Our teachers constantly encourage and motivate the campers and give them individual attention. This means that they will be able to learn with others who are at a similar stage. At the end of every week, teachers re-assess each camper to see if they have made sufficient progress to move up to the next class. Beginner English Language Lessons Our beginner English classes use a fun, creative approach to learning. One of our key aims of this class is to motivate and inspire our campers. Intermediate English Language Lessons Our intermediate English classes help campers progress their English language skills and increase their confidence. Advanced English Language Lessons Our advanced syllabus provides a successful blend of opportunities for campers to use and develop their English. Register for Summer
