An Explosion And A Song by Idris El Asha..A musician At a military check point Is composing a song For a child somewhere A farm woman works on the soil Mixing vinegar and olive oil Have many.

His mother, Zilpah Wadsworth, was the daughter of a Revolutionary War hero. His father, Stephen Longfellow, was a prominent Portland lawyer and later a member of Congress. Henry was a dreamy boy who loved to read. He heard sailors speaking Spanish, French and German in the Portland streets and liked stories set in foreign places: After graduating from Bowdoin College, Longfellow studied modern languages in Europe for three years, then returned to Bowdoin to teach them. In he married Mary Storer Potter of Portland, a former classmate, and soon published his first book, a description of his travels called Outre Mer "Overseas". The young teacher spent a grief-stricken year in Germany and Switzerland. Longfellow took a position at Harvard in Three years later, at the age of thirty-two, he published his first collection of poems, Voices of the Night, followed in by Ballads and Other Poems. Many of these poems "A Psalm of Life," for example showed people triumphing over adversity, and in a struggling young nation that theme was inspiring. In addition, Frances Appleton, a young woman from Boston, had refused his proposal of marriage. The couple had six children, five of whom lived to adulthood, and the marriage gave him new confidence. In , he published Evangeline, a book-length poem about what would now be called "ethnic cleansing. In , Longfellow decided to quit teaching to devote all his time to poetry. Both books were immensely successful, but Longfellow was now preoccupied with national events. A few months after the war began in , Frances Longfellow was sealing an envelope with wax when her dress caught fire. Profoundly saddened, Longfellow published nothing for the next two years. Later, he produced its first American translation. When the Civil War ended in , the poet was fifty-eight. His most important work was finished, but his fame kept growing. In London alone, twenty-four different companies were publishing his work. His poems were popular throughout the English-speaking world, and they were widely translated, making him the most famous American of his day. From to , Longfellow published seven more books of poetry, and his seventy-fifth birthday in was celebrated across the country. But his health was failing, and he died the following month, on March

Write at a different time If you usually write in the morning, try writing in the afternoon or at night. Mix up your routine in honor of summer and notice the difference in your space. Study the light coming through your window. Notice the steam from our coffee or possibly the legs on a glass of wine. Be in a different moment of the day and draw from your creative core. See if something new and enlightening can crawl out onto the page. I tried this the other day. I typically write in the mornings or at night. However, on summer vacation from teaching, the house was unusually quiet and free from family interruptions. I had already been working on homework for a class all morning and knew I had plans that evening. After a quick bite of nourishment, and a change of pace, I decided to head back to my office to work on my fantasy rewrite. Wow – the room was filled with light bouncing off the walls. The multiple lawn mowers from down the street were in tune with one another. Writing routines are comfortable, and I love mine. But this afternoon writing was rejuvenating and animated. There was so much busyness going on outside my window. The clouds moved the light every few moments and the birds bickered with the squirrels. The day was alive, and I accepted its gift of time. I offer this summertime gift to you too! Try out a new writing time and see what happens. Art by Vladimir Volegov.

3: The Trouble With Poetry - And Other Poems Quotes by Billy Collins

We never hear the actual explosion--we feel the tremor, we see its effects, almost as in a movie. The italicized words seem hymn-like, and in the aftermath of the explosion, the meter goes slacker and iambic, before the meter takes up again the burden of the trochees.

Words can hold such power, Especially if we allow them to. The decision is ours and ours alone, It can mean one thing or two. If the words are negative in general, This can create much harm. Whether they come from you or someone else, Believing in them is cause for alarm. If the words are positive, Allow yourself to hear. And never let them disappear. Words can hold much power, But only if you allow. The power really lies in your hands, Choose only to hear the positive, make this your vow. Changes I sought for joy in peace, and rest to ease my weary mind, Stressed out by such a heavy load, rest I just had to find. My endurance could hold no more, my limits had been met, I needed time to stand aside, sweet time to just forget. No one could tell me what to do, I was a self-made man; My schedules were controlled by me, I had a thorough plan. I had no friends that knew my plight, I kept myself at bay, They all had troubles of their own; besides, what could they say? They envied me with all my wealth, they never saw my pain, I had life altogether, what more was there to gain? But loneliness is terrible and emptiness is sad, There seems no purpose for each day, no reason to be glad. So now I wait; why? There must be more than fortunes, a way to rearrange. There has to be a purpose, and someone surely knows, Why life is complicated, and days so full of woes. Someday I hope to thank you because you saw my need, Perhaps with greater meaning, with purpose, not with greed. To quote the poet, John McLeod: Reading a poem can change your thinking on a topic, or it can describe how you are feeling.

Besher is studying in the American Sign Language English Interpretation Program at LaGuardia Community College with the goal of making scholarly and cultural events accessible to the Deaf community and supporting Deaf talent. In addition, she is an artist educator and museum guide, currently working at Dia Art Foundation. In her introduction to the evening performance, Deaf scholar Rachel Mazique from the Rochester Institute of Technology spoke about Deaf literature as an emerging genre within the American canon, holding its rightful place alongside other minority literatures. However, Deaf literature cannot be found in its own section in most bookstores due to the scarcity of publications and lack of awareness in mainstream literary circuits. This event was hosted by the Center for the Humanities at the Graduate Center of the City University of New York, an institution with no affiliation to Deaf scholarship, but with a long-standing commitment to research and public programming in literature and poetics. Hosting this conversation at CUNY was a deliberate effort to bridge the gap between hearing and Deaf audiences. Deaf author and artist Adrean Clark led an exercise in translation, exploring the creative potentials of the written systems of ASL. Developed by and for the DeafBlind community over the past decade, ProTactile is haptic, using the whole body to establish space, syntax, tone, and all the elements of a complex linguistic system. Clark performed one of his poems, originally written in English, in ProTactile on the body of his interpreter. This was observed and signed in ASL from one Certified Deaf Interpreter to another, and simultaneously voiced into English by a hearing interpreter. Their spoken words and visual signs met and bounced off of each other. The audience witnessed the triangulated ping-pong of interpretation as the ASL poem was supplemented by spoken words and simultaneously interpreted back into ASL. What is lost, what is gained, and what new meanings emerge in the tension and translation between ASL and English? How can ASL users assert their own literary genre, their own poetic forms, while also reaching audiences beyond the Deaf community? These questions may not have easy answers, but they are worthwhile to examine, to hold in our hands, and to knead and morph into new ideas and discussions as we continue to take steps to honor, respect, and celebrate the talent of Deaf poets. To read more about the event, visit the Center for the Humanities website. Four people on auditorium stage. An interpreter stands to the left, wearing a black shirt and grey pants, signing with the Y handshape. John Lee Clark sits facing the camera, in a button up blue shirt and dark pants, signing with two V handshapes. Seated facing him and behind him are two interpreters wearing black shirts. Another interpreter kneels in front of John, facing him and the seated interpreters, signing with two F handshapes.

Before And After The Explosion by RIC www.enganchecubano.com is a big difference before and after the explosion i am not referring to what destroys buildings and kills a hundred people this has nothing to.

Written from the heart and soul. Recommend everyone reading it! I enjoyed these poems. Each told a part of a story. It was a beautiful and moving love story and some heartbreak. I did find myself getting a little irked with a few of the intensely rhyming poems though. Overall I enjoyed this book. I chose the book on NetGalley. With my great surprise and please this poet, Clive Saffron is a truly romantic man and romanticism his personal flag in a world so disenchanting and pretty stressed and a real real joy to read these wonderful love poems. They left me ecstatic in the real sense of the words. Saffron is able to portray what it means real love: A person changes when in a new relationship and in most cases for better because loving means to be able to give our best to the other one and vice versa. Life is more beauty, colors more vivid, air fresher. We are inspired by the other person, we add light and color at another existence and the same happens to us. Love is never opportunistic, but always grateful and a great gift. Love can be the best resource for bettering ourselves and our companion, as also said by the poet. These words are real balsam for the soul and big treasures, because they will reassure, they will speak of hope, they will speak, also when a love ends, of the beautiful gift experiences thanks to the time spent with the other person. There is a positive approach to the relationship with the other one and of course, there is Love. Love speaks through all these poems. Real love is everywhere. In every word, in every poem, in every felt sensation. Love as a personal growth, love as the best resource for our daily life. I do truly recommend to you this book of poetry for the beautiful words and sentiment expressed by the poet and because once for all, ladies and gentlemen:
