Other notable and widely reprinted stories included: Clair writing as Idris Seabright, July The basis for the movie Minority Report. Young , and Robert Bloch. These were most probably the work of the editor in many cases, though Frank Belknap Long wrote several of these for the inside front cover of the magazine. There was never a letter column, though in the very last issue there was a note that one was planned for future issues. The book review column, always titled "Universe in Books", appeared fairly regularly but was liable to be dropped if there was no room for it. It was originally signed "The Editor", and was presumably written by Sam Merwin; Robert Frazier took the column on when Merwin left at the end of Santesson took over in October and wrote every column that appeared from that point on. After the first few issues, which contained editorial essays from both editor and publisher, the editorials disappeared, though Santesson did sometimes fill a blank space with a few editorial comments. A couple of other non-fiction articles appeared late on, but with the exception of UFO-related material, and occasional filler paragraphs reporting science news, Fantastic Universe did not generally run science-related articles. The fourth issue, January , cut the price to 35 cents, and it stayed at that price for the rest of its life. The page count also dropped, to pages with the fourth issue, then to pages with the eighth issue, September The page count stayed at through the rest of the digest period, and for the first five issues of the "glossy" period under the new publisher. The very last issue cut the page count to pages. The first three issues were named with two months: At the end of the naming was changed to the odd numbered months; and then after January, March, May, and July, the magazine went monthly, starting with the September issue. This lasted without a break until the November issue. Another bimonthly schedule, starting with January , followed; the last King-Size Publications issue was September , and it was followed by an October issue from Great American. The remaining five issues followed a regular monthly schedule; the last issue was March The volume numbering scheme was fairly regular; the first five volumes had six numbers each. Volume 6 had only five numbers, in order to get the new volume 7 to start with the new year, in This lasted until volume 10 was cut short at five numbers when the magazine returned to a bimonthly schedule at the end of Volume 11 had six numbers; volume 12 had five. Beatrice Jones 2 issues May to August Leo Margulies 26 issues September to March Other artists, including Ed Emshwiller , Kelly Freas , and Mel Hunter , contributed covers; and towards the end there was a long sequence of covers by Virgil Finlay. Finlay also contributed much of the interior art in the last six issues; generally Great American did not credit the artists, but along with Finlay, Emshwiller and John Giunta were featured.
