Father Brown was G K Chesterton's most famous invention, the pudding-faced priest who solves crimes by using his knowledge of human evil and his ability to enter the mind of the criminal.

In the final minutes, everything slides around the corner and comes to rest, heaped along the curb. You have always slept on your left side, and suddenly you are on your back in the morning. The angle of the hill behind your new house has gotten steeper. In November you tell your wife that the wood in the fireplace must burn just so if it is going to last the evening. Your daughter decides to quit playing the piano forever. When you notice that the debris outside the door has been disturbed by the wind, been mixed really, a single pile now with a rounded shape at the top, you hope that the family house is still standing, that the tree fort in the oak will be able to bear your weight, that someone has been watering the flowers all along. The following poem was published in Cutbank: Becoming a Miser Suddenly the world stops turning. And every crack in the ground collapses within itself. Tiny pieces of bark fall from the trunks of trees, tumbling upon each other at odd angles, causing the birds overhead to circle again, look out of one eye, and fly toward something secure, an old nesting place or the sturdy branch above the river, where the wind is always from the east. It is this way with so much. And there was the lady down the block who had keys for everything: The smoke had crept up from the basement and turned the locks inside out You, too, have seen it all happen, the smallest things turning on themselves, leaving you with your arms extended, your eyes on the ground, looking for a footprint, a single leaf, a broken twig. And finally you tuck your hands in your pockets and move toward the open field, searching for the pile of rough stones someone else has assembled The following poem was published in Black Warrior Review: The Truth about Drowning The only parts of you that matter are your arms and legs, how fast they can move, if they have what it takes, their strength. And now you finally know what all of that meant. You would give anything for one sweet breath. You wonder who will find you, if your legs will be caught below the surface, your swollen hands finally touching the shore, your fingers pointing toward the road. Perhaps some boys fishing will notice the lightness of your hair as the water filters through it, or some teenagers with a six-pack will be walking along the bank and discover you making love to the shallows. And when you are lifted toward the sky, your eyelashes drying in the wind, every part of you that your parents loved will be laid bare. The following poem was published in American Scholar: The First Signs of Spring The house has finally stopped falling in upon itself, and the corners of the bedrooms have softened. You do not bump into things in your hurry to find daylight, in your search for the stairs. It is a time of doors opening smoothly, into the hallway, from one room to the next. The drain in the bathtub is clear again, and all running water has a destination. The tile feels good to your bare feet, and your ankles do not crack as you enter the shower. You begin to notice the length and coarseness of your hair, the curls behind your ears. You remember why you are fascinated by the colors of things: No one knows why it all comes down to this, why we always seem to look somewhere else. The following poems were published in Poetry: Waiting to Adopt a Child You begin to think there is nothing left for you. The air neither comes nor goes in the room upstairs, where the dust forms tiny balls along the floorboards, the fresh colors on the walls turn pale, the new furniture begins to creak in the night. Your wife knows beforehand what simple phrases you will utter, how you will move through the carpeted rooms of the house, looking at your image reflected in the windows, studying the sharp line of your nose, talking aloud to yourself about heritage. Each time you turn on the post light, even the moths fail to come. The music you play in your car floats out the windows before you hear it. Memories do not lie. Every image you own of childhood becomes clearer at night. When you reach over in bed to comfort your wife, you see the descending hand of your father, feel the way he stroked your hair in the moments before you slept. Your loss may soon be your gain. Connections My son treats me with his swagger, a bounce in his step I wish were mine. Clever at seven, he understands what adopted means but knows we share the same blood, really, man-to-man, fingers around the bat, talk of hard things on the surface, eyes. Maybe tomorrow you will find yourself sitting in a corner, your knees drawn up to your chin, your elbows shaking stiffly, like leaves, and all the lights will go out. Or you will realize that flames could end it all, and there will be no way out the back door. And all of the forgetting, the disappearing words of the sick people in our dreams, those who told us it would be like this, the long finger of some distant uncle pointing down the road.
