Yet in his grave He is the first true householder to have A freehold tenure, a soil that is his own. They came ashore still looking over their shoulder, Irritable rather than exultant, bolder Than their brothers but usually broker too. Some wily tried to join their worlds together By leaving a name to interpret what they felt, And William Light would laugh to find misspelt The name of Theberton he gave his hut, "Now rows of houses with their front doors shut, A respectable suburb known as Thebarton, In Adelaide, a city he had begun Three years before his death, and got no thanks. On asking where To find the Hall I heard that history Had found it first. By now most of one storey Had been demolished and sold off for junk. We are fools to stumble down there with a thirst, The only solution is to get drunk first. More democratic, certainly, this kind Of dance, more silent than satin, cheaper than gold. The stairways climb, and turn, and lead to no- where but the sky. The pheasant flies like a knight with banners trailing Over the young green field, and earthwards sailing Lands in glory, a dazzle of full summer In the flickering spring. Is there any more deadly pall Of funeral black than worn-out motor tyres Left in the rain and sun? What chance have the fires Of the pheasant against the jets that break The sky in two to leave their drifting wake. A good thing too. The old degree is gone. The Hall is far too grand for Theberton. William Light and others like him knew The corinthian columns would be knocked askew. In his case certain things hastened the process, No wife, no money and tuberculosis. Neither pheasants nor fountains flourish in the earth Where he lies now. Before his death the birth Of his new city was ugly and bloody, Quite normal for a birth. The streets were muddy That after his death, by now, are kept so clean One wishes a little dung were sometimes seen. Although we say the old degree is gone, Is Adelaide much wilder than Theberton? A little touch of wowser in the night; It would not much appeal to William Light. Yet birds are wilder, the galah and cockatoo More dazzling than the pheasant, and wrens more blue Than the Delft tiles round the fireplace in his room. He would certainly try To make room for them in our hard, glittering sky.
