Inspiration , Tutorials Tagged With: In accordance with her watercolor know-how, she has created this tutorial for us to learn how to create gorgeous watercolor flowers. You can use this technique to make your own note cards, birthday cards, place settings, wedding paper goods, or art to hang in your home! Part of the fun is letting the watercolors have control and just watching what comes out of the brush. A jar or tub of water Watercolor paints Crayola works just fine! Also note that Styrofoam egg cartons make awesome palettes. The thicker the paper, the less likely it is to warp. Cut your paper into the sizes you want to work with. Choose the colors you want to use. You can use whatever colors you want, but I recommend choosing shades that are next to each other on the color wheel for the flowers, and some sort of green for the leaves and stems. Fill in the U shape so it looks like a side view of petals, and then paint a thinner squiggly shape above the lower petals, leaving a very thin white space between what is now the front and back petals of the flower. Dab the contrasting color along the bottom of the flower and allow it to bleed into the blue for a shaded effect. If the color comes on too dark you can blot it with a paper towel for a different effect. Using your smallest brush, pick up some green paint and add a blob of green to the bottom of the flower. In a delicate, quick motion, draw a line down from the flower for the stem. This one looks like a thistle or spider mum. Quickly swipe the paint down in curved lines from one central point, in an umbrella shape. Pick up more water and paint as your brush will dry out after two or three swipes. In green, add a curving stem to the flower, again using a very quick and light sweep of the smallest brush. Draw a curving stem and then in blue paint a little blob at the end of the stem. With purple, add a dot of contrasting purple to the bud. Mine was very dark so I blotted it with a paper towel. Next I painted another poppy flower in blue and purple, using similar technique as the very first flower. I made a different shape though. After the flowers have dried, you can go back with a small brush and add some detail to the petals. I decided to add one more flower, a small blue one. I painted a basic front-facing flower shape in blue and then blotted it with a paper towel. To make a leaf, press down and then back up with your brush, connecting to the stem. I added some more detail to the flower after it was dry by painting dark dots in the center. My magenta flower was looking a little sparse so I went back and filled it in with some more color. Note my piece of scrap paper on the side. One hundred and one dollars.

In Tanning attended Galesburg public schools. When she was attending high school Tanning "skipped" two grades, which led to a lifelong weakness in arithmetic. After an eight-year relationship, she was married briefly to the writer Homer Shannon in 1937. As Tanning recounts in her memoirs, he was enchanted by her iconic self-portrait Birthday, Philadelphia Museum of Art. The two played chess, fell in love, and embarked on a life together that took them to Sedona in Arizona, and later to France. Tanning and Ernst were married in a double wedding with Man Ray and Juliet Browner in Hollywood and they were married for 30 years. Tanning died on January 31, 1990, at her Manhattan home at age 72. Apart from three weeks she spent at the Chicago Academy of Fine Art in 1937, [10] Tanning was a self-taught artist. Like other Surrealist painters, she was meticulous in her attention to details and in building up surfaces with carefully muted brushstrokes. Now working in Paris and Huismes, France, she began to move away from Surrealism and develop her own style. During the mid-1940s, her work radically changed and her images became increasingly fragmented and prismatic, exemplified in works such as Insomnias, Moderna Museet, Stockholm. As she explains, "Around my canvases literally splintered I broke the mirror, you might say. These years included, for Dorothea Tanning, an intense five-year adventure in soft sculpture. In 1947, she published her first memoir, entitled Birthday for the painting that had figured so prominently in her biography. It has since been translated into four other languages. In 1954, she wrote an expanded version of her memoir called Between Lives: An Artist and Her World. With the encouragement of her friend and mentor James Merrill who was for many years Chancellor of the Academy of American Poets, [23] Tanning began to write her own poetry in her eighties, and her poems were published regularly in literary reviews and magazines such as The Yale Review, Poetry, The Paris Review, and The New Yorker until the end of her life. A collection of her poems, A Table of Content, and a short novel, Chasm: A Weekend, were both published in 1987. Her second collection of poems, Coming to That, was published by Graywolf Press in 1990. Books by Dorothea Tanning [edit] Coming to That: Overlook Press, and London:

Photographer Abelardo Morell is a relentlessly curious artist, often striving to capture complex images and ideas in single frames that seem to vibrate with intensity. His photographs can feel uncanny and surreal, making the viewer slow down to look more carefully, deconstructing exactly what the artist is putting in front of our eyes. And his images have staying power, lingering long in the memory and imagination of viewers, their ideas working like essential seeds long after first exposure. In his latest series, Flowers for Lisa, Morell takes a traditional still life subject — a vase of flowers — and pushes and pulls it well beyond the typical boundaries of that genre. What started with a single, romantic photograph for his wife, Lisa, became a muse-like obsession for him over the course of a few years. The result is a tour de force show of seemingly endless creativity, all while working within a self-imposed set of restrictions. Morell recounts the start for us: For one thing, it will last longer. I wanted, almost in some weird way, for it to be like a display of plumage. A little bit of a show-off, as if to catch her attention and gain her attraction. Look what I brought you this time. The new book includes more than 60 stellar examples of experimentation, presenting the images in chronological order of creation, reflecting the evolution of ideas and processes that informed each one. And at the end, after viewing full-page plates of these stunning images, Morell gives us a little inside commentary about each one — generous anecdotes that let us inside his creative process, what he was striving for, what may have inspired each particular photograph. LensCulture is delighted to be able to share nine of these new images here, along with insightful commentary about each one provided by the artist himself. We hope you find some true inspiration here. Flowers for Lisa Publisher: In traditional film photography, the technique I use here is called a double or multiple exposure: Two or more negatives are sandwiched together to form interesting composite prints. Some of my favorite examples of photographs using this process were made by Harry Callahan. The lovely thing about the silk is that its translucency makes nice shadows that combine with the object that produces those shadows. This frame approximates how large-format photographic cameras capture the world upside down on their ground glass. I like the way that, on the edges of the frame, some of the flowers in the image transform from shadow to apparently solid. In some works by Jan Brueghel the Elder and Roelandt Savery, among others, the flowers in vases are impossibly thick and high. For this still life I made the bouquets very tall and dense by positioning several layers of flowers at various depths and heights, one behind the other. Keeping the sharpness of focus the same throughout added to the illusion of a single gigantic bouquet. I think, however, that it came from the spirit of that film, which was shot in arresting Technicolor. It has been said that Sirk liked to use certain strong colors to suggest repressed emotions and troubles in his female characters. This one tries to show an excavation, much as archaeology reveals layers of history. I lit this picture from the side to give it a marked three-dimensional look. Everything in this image feels tactile, including the Scotch tape. It also aspires to the radiant haziness of the still-life photographs Josef Sudek made in his home in Prague. Puddles, it turns out, can also create flowers.
