Following the paper trail: Reflections on a career in paper coatings and packaging Following the paper trail: After spending over twenty-five of those years with the Dispersions and Resins unit at BASF, Hayes is gearing up for retirement in September, but not before sharing his insights on the paper coatings and packaging industry as he knows it. The first is designing polymers for paper coatings and packaging, including styrene, butadiene and styrene acrylate polymers. These are used principally as the binding agent that holds the coating together. That means applying the polymers onto paper or paperboard and testing the results after the coating has been dried and calendared meaning it was glossed using a special set of pressure and temperature rolls. He also works cooperatively with colleagues in Asia, South America and Europe. Trending topics in paper coatings As someone so closely involved in the development of paper coating products, Hayes has had to keep a finger on the pulse of industry trends. For instance, in response to tightening regulations, manufacturers have been working harder to reduce the toxicity of their products, particularly when it comes to carcinogenic materials. Considering that trend, Hayes says it will be all the more important to foster strong partnerships with customers. Because BASF co-develops products with customers and collaborative partners, the success of their products often relies on the strength of their working relationships. Because paper is a commodity, the product must be very effective and less costly to produce or use in a formulation. An industry in flux The value proposition has been increasingly important across the history of paper coatings – particularly when the industry faced substantial consolidation to just a few big competitors. Hayes remembers this as one of the most significant changes in his career. The effects of global restructuring and a decrease in global demand left just a handful of companies in the industry, creating a much more competitive environment. Besides the effects of consolidation, industry players have also had to keep a closer eye on regulatory standards over the years. As new information arises from toxicology studies, EPA surveys and other research, regulations have become stricter. We are also known for developing higher strength binders, which have more binding power and allow you to use less material. For Hayes, the future of graphical paper coatings may be levelling out after a steady decline, but the biggest opportunities lie in packaging. I think the packaging of the future will be quite different. He also wants to get involved with a Catholic volunteer organization. And also laying on the beach.
