Me playing the Forrest Gump Suite by Alan Silvestri on a Yamaha CLP

Forrest Gump novel "The writer, Eric Roth, departed substantially from the book. We flipped the two elements of the book, making the love story primary and the fantastic adventures secondary. Also, the book was cynical and colder than the movie. In the movie, Gump is a completely decent character, always true to his word. He has no agenda and no opinion about anything except Jenny, his mother and God. Both center on the character of Forrest Gump. However, the film primarily focuses on the first eleven chapters of the novel, before skipping ahead to the end of the novel with the founding of Bubba Gump Shrimp Co. Terry Gilliam turned down the offer. Filming began in August and ended in December of that year. The most notable place was Grandfather Mountain where a part of the road is named "Forrest Gump Curve". There were other scenes filmed in and around the Savannah area as well, including a running shot on the Richard V. A variety of visual effects were used to incorporate Tom Hanks into archive footage with various historical figures and events. Using CGI techniques, it was possible to depict Gump meeting deceased personages and shaking their hands. Hanks was first shot against a blue screen along with reference markers so that he could line up with the archive footage. In one Vietnam War scene, Gump carries Bubba away from an incoming napalm attack. To create the effect, stunt actors were initially used for compositing purposes. Then, Hanks and Williamson were filmed, with Williamson supported by a cable wire as Hanks ran with him. The explosion was then filmed, and the actors were digitally added to appear just in front of the explosions. The jet fighters and napalm canisters were also added by CGI. At one point, while hoisting himself into his wheelchair, his legs are used for support. Over two days of filming, approximately 1,000 extras were used. With the help of computers, the extras were multiplied to create a crowd of several hundred thousand people. Or maybe a drama. The screenplay by Eric Roth has the complexity of modern fiction. The performance is a breathtaking balancing act between comedy and sadness, in a story rich in big laughs and quiet truths. What a magical movie. The budget was immediately increased, per his advice. A New Hope, and Jurassic Park. Special features included director and producer commentaries, production featurettes, and screen tests.
