The astonishing variety across the country means that Ireland really does experience four seasons in one day. Typical Weather in Ireland Rain, rain, and a bit of sun is probably the best summary of what to expect from the Irish climate. Conditions are generally damp yet mild. It does rain a lot, but that is what gives Ireland the lush, verdant countryside that makes it so charming. Ireland can be quite windy, especially near the coast. The country is farther north than you might think, with cold air blowing down from the Arctic. It is this chilly wind passing over the warm, moist airflow of the Gulf Stream that produces the misty conditions typically associated with Ireland. Skies are often cloudy, but there are occasional sunny spells. Rain showers can be very sudden but are often quite brief. These rapidly changing conditions mean that you will frequently experience four seasons in one day, and stunning rainbows are a regular feature of Irish weather. Generally speaking, temperatures are reasonably consistent all year round and extremes of hot and cold are quite rare. January and February are definitely the chillier months, so you will need to pack some warmer clothing including a hat and gloves to protect yourself from the wind. Snow is relatively rare, so if there is sudden freeze, expect that everyone will be quite surprised and possibly quite unprepared. The tops of the mountains might receive a dusting of snow and ice, but the roads and towns will be unaffected for the most part. However, dressing for a day trip here can be a little tricky. You might wake up to glorious sunshine but end up facing a dramatic downpour of almost biblical proportions by lunchtime, so the key is to be ready for anything. Wear plenty of thin layers so you can add or remove clothes as necessary. You will probably get rained on at some stage, but an umbrella is not the most practical option. If the rain is accompanied by high winds, which is a frequent occurrence, you will simply find yourself struggling to stop it turning inside out. A rainproof top that you can pack away if not required is a much better solution. A hat will help keep your ears warm during any stiff Irish breezes. Wear sensible footwear because the ground is often wet and will probably be slippery underfoot, especially in more rugged areas. If you are heading out into the rural and coastal countryside then renting a small car will be your best weather protection and you will be able to keep multiple pairs of clothing and footwear. The answer to this question depends on what kind of weather you like. The weather in Ireland is influenced largely by the warm air moving across the Atlantic Ocean and is more moderate than that found in other countries of an equivalent latitude. Conditions in Ireland are milder inland, so this might be something to factor into your decision if you are thinking of moving there. Dublin and the south-east are the driest parts of Ireland, usually experiencing around mm of rain annually; some of the more mountainous regions can reach 2, mm in a very wet year. The eastern side of the island experiences less rain than the west, where storms can blow up quite suddenly with little warning. If you like your weather dramatic, the Irish coastline has plenty to offer thanks to the Gulf Stream. In contrast, the west coast has a micro-climate that supports plenty of lush sub-tropical vegetation. Although these coastal areas vary hugely in terms of the Irish climate, they experience very little change throughout the year. The Irish weather has a unique charm all of its own and is one of the things that makes a visit here so special. There is no denying that it is extremely wet much of the time, so be prepared to spend most of your time in waterproofs. If you are considering living or working here, it is also probably well worth investing in some quality wellies or boots to keep your feet dry. Nevertheless, thanks to the warmth of the Gulf Stream, the enormous quantities of rain are offset by a humid and mild climate with reasonably consistent temperatures all year round. After all, what would Ireland be without its luxuriantly gorgeous emerald green landscape?
