Frankly - Just Between Us is a fantastic book. I read the whole thing in two days. I could barely put it down. It's one of the best insights into not only Vincent Falcone, but also one of the best insights into Frank Sinatra.

By Sarah Nielsen I work as a volunteer in drug abuse awareness, using shock and awe statistics to wake people up to the fact that we have a drug crisis in our American suburbs. The headline happened to us: Some of those heartbroken parents are still watching the downward spiral, some lost their children, and some have seen their child find recovery. I am the latter. Imagine how grateful we are if you can. I recently told a neighbor, who asked how I spend my time, that I advocate for parents whose kids are struggling with substance abuse. He sharply extended his left arm, grabbed his bicep firmly with his right hand, and aggressively pulled his forearm toward him. I wondered what he thought. Bad behavior goes with the territory to be sure and bad behavior reaps consequences. No dispute there, not from me, not from our son. Amends need to be made and in our family, they have been. I shared with him, that treatment works and today over 23 million Americans are living in long-term recovery. He worked as an ER physician and received his M. By the end of our lunch, I had made a new friend and so had he. He had conversed over a meal with a normal someone who loved an addict, and I could see him soften. I spoke his language: When I speak to parents at treatment centers or wherever God leads, like a recent sweet exchange with a store clerk, they are eager to know how our story ends. What that means to me is that I have not had a drink or a mood-altering drug in over eight years. No doubt, it makes for good storytelling as sad as it is. Every single person in the family suffers and they each have their own take on the pain. We are a family in recovery. Each one of us has experienced our own metamorphosis from who we were before Ted found sobriety. Ted received 90 days of in-patient treatment and 90 days at a nearby halfway house while he enrolled in a commuter college. He had flunked out of college twice while using drugs. He sat at the computer and wheeled his desk chair to the side so I could see. That was a transition summer when he lived at home under a contract he drew up to which we both agreed. He worked full-time and went to step meetings at night where he often picked up and dropped off others who had lost their licenses. Some were fifty years old with stringy pony tails, bad teeth, and a desire to stop drinking. He transferred to Augsburg College in Minneapolis with a program for students in recoveryâ€”one of the early miracles we discovered by the grace of God. I went to step meetings of friends and families of alcoholics where I found tools for living my own life apart from the choices others may make. Our other two sons could tell you what God built in them from losing their brother for a season, and the restoration that came later. My husband has implemented The Serenity Prayer into his law practice. Our story keeps lengthening. He sent me a three-page email answering that question. If your child is hanging out with kids who are using drugs, chances are your child is too. Withdrawal from family activities or early departure. Going out every night, including holidays. Increasing silence, sullenness, and secrecy. Not bringing friends over to hang out at your house. Our son told us his team smoked pot together before tournaments. They also have a hotline for parent questions and help. Be careful about judging resources that are not officially Christian. God has gifted people in the field of alcohol and drug abuse just as He has gifted mechanics, physicians, or musicians. Teen drug and alcohol use comes with drama, worry, and fear. I urge moms, dads, siblings, and even grandparents to take advantage of groups where others are in the same situation. It was invaluable to be in a place where someone understood what it was like to be me. Talk to your kids about alcohol and other drugs starting in sixth grade or before. Listen to what they say. Ask questions and hear their answers without judgement. Establish a code word for them to text to have you come and get them or to call to come home. Life may become more complicated for you, but this is a season where your teen deeply needs you. Establish early on that you will inspect their room, car, backpack, and phone from time to time for their health and safety. Then do random checks with clearly established consequences for violations that you enforce. My parents drug test me. If they still use despite experiencing consequences, there might be a bigger problem. Recognize that marijuana is not harmless. Teens will argue that marijuana is less dangerous than alcohol. Even if it was, you have a zero tolerance for alcohol or drug use in your home. If your world revolves around drinking, kids notice.
