A golfing acquaintance, Daniel Alex Rocha, with a minor criminal history, and Blackthorne asked him to help. In my trawl through I only found one actor disambiguated as Welsh. There are 26 Wikipedia articles with the disambiguation ".. British actress " and 35 articles with the disambiguation ". I first got to thinking about this issue in response to reference to Britannica articles such as: Although most Britannica articles seem to be subtitled in this way I later also found: None-the-less I think that this may be a good way to standardise article titles. In certain cases there may be nothing to verify whether a person identifies as a member of any of the constituent countries of the UK and yet they all have British citizenship. Nationality of people from the United Kingdom. My opinion is that they should all be denoted as British. Mr Stephen talk In the case of disambiguated titles I think it is worth presenting "British" in the disambiguation and then to present more local details in the article content. IE, not British actor. Lugnuts Dick Laurent is dead Additionally, "British" is too vague when specifics are known. If any of them are going to be moved, they should be addressed independently. GregKaye , to be honest when the UK has one united British football team in the one sport that anyone in UK actually cares about then maybe. I mean " British footballer "? In ictu oculi talk If someone is from Scotland, England or Wales it is hardly subjective to state that in the title of their article. The one single anchor point that they have in common is their citizenship. I am not making suggestions here but even in regard to football see: List of England international footballers born outside England. Each person will regardless be a British citizen and then choose their allegiance. The same equally true of people in other spheres of activity. At the very least, they should be accessible from "British" if no other Brit shares their name -- As you can see from this identity card , these people are legally classified as "British citizens. These people are British. This is the equivalent of having Katharine Hepburn at Katharine Hepburn Connecticutian actress or Tracy Reed Londonite actress , and it is downright absurd. We disambiguate by state on Wikipedia, not by town, county or historical region.. They are merely regions of the British state. There is no difference between suggesting that one use "Scottish actor" and suggesting that one use "Texan actor" or "Alaskan actor". We do not use such designations for actors from anywhere on Wikipedia, and there is no reason why we should do so for actors from Britain. In fact, American states have more sovereignty than these regions, because of the nature of the American federal system. If one must have "Scottish actor", one must have "Texan actor". Britain is the state, and the sovereign entity. Disambiguation must be applied consistently, unless we are to start writing " Silesian actor" or " Galician poet". There is no justification for using the non-existent "Scottish" and "English" designations. It would be more like saying "American" or "Canadian". Both of those are sovereign states, i. There is no such thing as either "Scotland" or "England". No such sovereign entities exist. The only sovereign entity is the British state, i. Scotland and England are mere historical regions, on par with Silesia and Galicia, or maybe Cornwall or Devon. We do not use historical regions for disambiguation. We disambiguate on the basis of the state that a person has origins in. These people are from British state. If within the article a narrower term is used, such as English, then that seems to a good solution -- WP can have it both ways. WP might want to give actors a bit more latitude to self-identify. Also I believe that titles of articles are not that easy to correct if a mistake is made, and they are not obviously attached to a reliable source. The editor RGloucester makes a good point: Give WP a break, I say. You could argue that it supports both or neither if you wanted to. Egsan Bacon talk At least two of the nominated people do not refer to themselves as "British. Americans of Irish descent and the myriad other similar categorizations. Either definition by nationality is permissible or it is not. Please do not modify it. Subsequent comments should be made in a new section on this talk page or in a move review. No further edits should be made to this section.
