May Words Shan Routledge Rising above his lowly circumstances, real-life hero Sibusiso Vilane became the first black African to summit Everest twice and by two different routes. Born at Shongwe Mission in Mpumalanga, Sibusiso Vilane never dreamt he would one day stand on top of the world. It was when Vilane was working as a game ranger in Swaziland that he finally found his catalyst for change: He met Doble in and not only did they become great friends, but he inspired Vilane to take on the world and was instrumental in finding the necessary sponsorship for his Everest summit expedition. Just three short years later, he summited Kilimanjaro – the start of an incredible journey that would eventually lead him to the summit of the highest mountain in the world, Everest. But the journey to the Queen of the Himalayas was not easy: Finding a team was the greatest obstacle. He considered himself well prepared when he finally made the journey back to the Himalayas. But he attributes his success not to his training, but his determination. He strongly believes that once he has committed to something, he has to succeed. I have a very strong self-belief and I am very adaptable. We had been pushed down the summit attempt twice in severe wind and snow storms – both experiences were very devastating and we were all losing hope on the weather. I could not contain myself, the joy was overwhelming and it was the best feeling of my life! I get goose bumps thinking about it now! Being the first black African to summit Everest was not enough, however, and in he summited again along the North Ridge – the more difficult and statistically less successful side. Though, summiting for the second time was not the highlight of his trip – as he always believed he would make it – but rather it was summiting with top explorer Sir Ranulph Fiennes, whom Vilane had personally asked to accompany him. This was merely the beginning of his relationship with various charities: Vilane has since worked with Lifeline Energy, which provides underprivileged communities with renewable energy alternatives, as well as the Nelson Mandela Bangles programme. After conquering Everest and Kilimanjaro, it seemed only natural to Vilane that he continue climbing and complete the Seven Summits: He dedicated the 1 kilometres he trekked to the South Pole – in some of the worst conditions imaginable – to the children of South Africa. In May , as a result of this generous act and the hundreds of sponsors supporting him, Lifeline Energy was able to provide radios to children from the Nkomazi District Municipality, where he was born. So in early , he trekked to the North Pole, thereby completing the challenge. With a list of achievements in the Guinness World Records, and accolades that include being awarded the Order of Ikhamanga Bronze by former president Thabo Mbeki and meeting the Queen of England, he could surely say he has done all he wants to do, but he says: Yes, I have seen almost every corner of the Earth, but the one thing I look forward to is returning home to the warmth of the people and the sun. With an irrepressible spirit and infectious enthusiasm for life which inspires and uplifts people of all backgrounds and circumstances, and particularly children, Vilane is a real-life hero. How this boy, who was once a goat herder, turned into one of the top climbers and expedition leaders in the world, can only be due to his pure spirit and determination. It is amazing, and I am very grateful to all those who have helped me to achieve all that I have achieved. Now, like most great men and women, I have a legacy.
