

1: Reviews of Galloping the Globe

I purchased "Galloping the Globe" because I needed a comprehensive guide for teaching world geography to my children, 10, 9, and 7. This has turned out to be an excellent choice. I love the sections on each country which suggest activities, recipes, other supplemental reading and information on holidays in each country.

We all want to go there now! Andrew tries at cursive writing. We painted the Australian flag. One family in particular has been very helpful and very sweet! Meet the Webers, missionaries to Australia. Pray for them as they reach out across the world to tell others the good news of Jesus Christ! Contact me and I would be happy to share some of the fun information Rachel has shared with me about Australia and their precious family. We made Anzac Biscuits cookies, using honey for the syrup. Aboriginal art is made up of lots of dots! So we all did some dot painting with round paintbrushes. We were able to experience a variety of Aussie tastes thanks to Simply Australian! Most of the treats were well liked. The Vegemite isn't so much. The boys could not believe that Australian children use this stuff like Americans use peanut butter! Slang words were enjoyed using those around the house. We learned a lot about marsupials! They really enjoyed learning about kangaroos and koalas. We even have two Playmobil Kangaroos with Joeys. They love these little things, and so do I! I even stumbled across some Kangaroo Pita Pockets for super cheap at Kroger, so we had those for lunch one day! Daddy taught his Friday art lesson one week on koalas using Draw Then Write. We bought some eucalyptus to smell! We watched two Netflix videos: Wildest Australia and Discovery Atlas: Another art project we did was rock painting, again like the Aborigines Indians. First, find some nice flat stones. Lay them on a baking sheet covered with foil. Bake for 2 hours at degrees to slowly warm them up. Remove carefully and place them on newspaper. Pressing crayons on them will cause the wax to melt and make beautiful colors. They cool down pretty quickly, but I waited until the next day to let the boys play with them. They loved this activity!

But the tea was great, and we had a full buffet of pastries, juices and hard boiled eggs to fill us up. The prior evening, Derek had finally reached Mama Farmer in her hotel room in Paris – she and Candy were sound asleep. Despite their foggy brains, we managed to make a plan that we thought would work: That morning we decided to take the train into Naples a couple hours early, so that we could explore the city a bit before meeting them. There was construction, plus multiple entrances. Mama Farmer and Candy might be in trouble. That aside, we made our way through the crowded streets and bus terminals outside the station, following our very basic map toward the main cathedral Duomo di Napoli http: Our route took us on the edge of what appeared to be a bit of a rough neighborhood – broken glass bottles everywhere, with cheap flea market vendors peddling goods. It was also interesting to traverse the narrow streets in that neighborhood to get a feel for the city. Overall it seemed crowded, unkempt and a little shady. Lots of clothes hanging out to dry. So our traipse around the city was short-lived. We were barely on track to get back in time to meet the ladies. And we had no idea where they would be lurking. We hoofed it down to the ticket office for our train to see if they were there. So we took the escalators back up to the main level, and seconds later we literally bumped into them. Pompeii half way to Sorrento. Everyone was hungry when we got off the train a half-hour later, so we gladly accepted an invitation into a mostly-tented restaurant right outside the Pompeii excavation site. There we had paninis and hot tea, trying to warm up before our adventure back in time. The former is spread out and not as restored, which means your feet really take a beating and you have to use your imagination. The weather was excellent for January , so we enjoyed tromping around in the afternoon sun to the various points of interest. Then we headed back to the train for Sorrento. The gals checked into the hotel, and then we headed into town for shopping and dinner. This was a preview of the amount of walking they would do during their stay with us. Mama Farmer was especially enamored with stores that had both limoncello AND painted pottery. It seemed that a platter was on her list of things to buy. My favorite was the creamy sort of limoncello, while Mr. Farmer preferred his straight-up. Candy later gave us a recipe for the creamy kind, which we have yet to make. We were sitting in the make-shift canvas room near the door, which meant we just about froze. Dinner was nice – but Mr. Sometime during the evening we stopped to take photos of Christmas lights. Then it was lights out.

A momma of five. A maker of slow food and simple living. A collector of memories, a keeper of books, and a champion for books that make memories. An addict who likes my half-and-half with a splash of coffee. A fractured pot transformed by the One Who makes broken things beautiful. Be sure to subscribe to my monthly newsletter. We always love getting together with the gang to learn in a larger, significantly more animated setting. As I mentioned last week, our group has chosen to do a geography study this year. We have been enjoying the curriculum so much, I just have to take a quick minute to tell you about it Galloping the Globe. Although, we are strictly using it for group geography lessons, this well-organized, unit-study style curriculum includes sections that focus on geography, historical biography, literature, language arts, science, and Bible. With the exception of math, it is an all-inclusive curriculum. Each major section of the book details one of the seven major world continents. Within those sections, numerous chapters are included, each focusing on one country within that continent. I can print the maps and flags directly from my computer instead of having to make a lopsided xerox copy from a bulky book. The hard copy of the book now comes with a CD of all included printables. Obviously, the curriculum features the major countries within the seven continents, but Galloping the Globe also includes units for numerous lesser-known countries. The activities list makes it possible for even the most "un-crafty" of moms to be able to provide some hands-on creative learning. But, the easy "print this page" button located at the top of each page makes it possible for me to print only the pages I need in order to take them along when and where I want. The Nitty Gritty pages This includes resource and bio pages.
