

1: BBC One - Getting the Builders In - Episode guide

Getting the Builders In. Three pairs of builders go head to head, pricing up jobs and offering designs, and the homeowners choose which team to go with. On iPlayer. Not available. On TV.

Fortunately, you can get building faster. The most common reason for builders not getting back to clients is because they have no systems or organisation skills. This leads to builders simply forgetting about you. Some builders may be great at organising their site, but when it comes to running the business side of things, these skills may not always cross over. Unfortunately, a lot of builders are not necessarily the best at running their businesses. Because builders might not have the necessary systems in place, they may not be able to organise potential jobs and chase up enquiries and quotes. Builders who take the time to run a tight business with organisational systems in place are much more likely to do a good job on your home building. Plus, calling someone back is just good manners! The solution is to find a builder with good organisational skills. This building relationship was never meant to be. Whether you get a call back from a home builder says a lot about how your experience with them will be. Your time is valuable, and you would be more likely to have a smooth home building experience with someone who responds to your enquiry. If you get a quote with a simple figure down the bottom of the page without any information about where it will be spent, you should be wary. This builder is likely liaising with many people, and may not remember the specific details of your job. Basically, they are hustling for cash. This is a bad sign from the get-go. First of all, you want the estimates on your home building project to be specified and laid out piece by piece. You also want to know that your builder has attention to detail. Be clear that you need a detailed quote and a timeframe to go with it to ensure your building gets done within your budget and the timeframe you require. If you are investing your time in talking with a builder and requesting a quote, then you need to be realistic about that budget. You also need to be receptive to perhaps not getting exactly the ideas that you want, as the costs of home building can often be above what people expect. Many times this will occur because the designer or architect has not communicated with you and your builder. Good communication and a mutual understanding between all parties will get you the best results. The solution is to try to facilitate communication between everyone involved in your building project. This will ensure that there are no budget and concept misunderstandings. Get your builder involved in the design process – that will cut out lots of negotiations and everyone will be on the same page from the start. It might go in a different direction to what you thought, but it could be even better than you imagined! Now that you know about the three most common reasons for not hearing back from your builder, hopefully, you can start communicating well with your builder and get started on your project.

Check if you need permission or approval You may have to get more than one kind of permission or approval before you go ahead with work on your home. Always check if you need: These are schemes that are approved by the government. You also have to pay a fee for them to come and inspect the work you have carried out. If you have to get approval or permission You may need to hire a surveyor or architect to help you apply for building regulations approval or planning permission. You may have to get permission from the freeholder before work starts. You may have to pay some costs. You may also have to undo the work, eg remove a new extension. How to find good builders or contractors Recommendations and references are good ways to find reliable contractors who do a good job. For instance, you can: They may be hard to contact if problems come up. You can always find someone else to do the work. Get quotes before you decide who to use A quote is a promise from the contractor to do the work at a fixed price. Some contractors charge for quotes - ask about this first. Try to get written quotes from at least 3 different contractors before you decide on one. Make sure you get a quote, not an estimate. An estimate is just a rough guess, so you could end up paying more. Also be cautious if their price is a lot lower than other quotes you get. What a quote should include Be very clear about the work you want done - this will help you get the most accurate price and prevent misunderstandings later. A quote should include: Avoid this by getting them to put in writing: See a sample quote You can download a PDF of a sample quote. Insurance-backed warranties or guarantees - you can buy one of these as part of the cost of the work, if the contractor offers it. You may have to pay more for your insurance during and after the work. They might suggest that you take out joint insurance with the contractor. You might feel more secure knowing you have insurance in place in case of any damage or if anything goes missing. Always try to get a contract in writing before you give the go-ahead. If the contractor gives you a contract, check if it covers everything you agreed.
