EMBED (for www.enganhecubano.com hosted blogs and www.enganhecubano.com item tags).

Copy provided by the publisher and NetGalley in exchange for an honest review. Yeah, I am totally blaming her for being so nice and easy to talk to. We literally end up talking for like 4 hours during our buddy-read instead of actually reading. After reading the synopsis I was waiting for a very emotional read. It deals with the two siblings of a teenage couple who committed suicide, and how they follow a list of things to do they left behind. Mild trigger warning for a book dealing with suicide aftermaths, but is honestly very light. This book was written in the third person but it changed point of view between Oliver and Daphne, so I did enjoy getting both sides of the story. I kinda feel a bit cheated on this. I was waiting for an epic journey of grief and adventure, but that honestly took the backseat to focus on the relationship between the two main characters. This is a character-driven book, definitely. Although is not slow at all, it actually moves a bit too fast in my opinion. The time jumps from one chapter to another were quite big. But yeah it focused too much on the romance which for some reason lessened points for me because I feel we never went deep into the grief subject. Oliver is a very teenage boy like character, asshole but not the hateable kind. I really enjoyed the fact he was the mascot of his school team instead of the star player or something, it was very refreshing. He also had a fixation on black bras for some reason, we joked a lot about that with Nadhira. Daphne, on the other hand, was more peculiar and it gave me a few manic pixie vibes although Nadhira says it was more of the friend of a manic pixie. She had a very retro-thrift store fashion and was apparently very very smart. Okay, that last bit was kind of funny, because Oliver could discern how smart she was just by looking at her, a small roll of eyes to that. But I enjoyed how direct her character was, the honesty was on point. I was rooting for them, but at the same time, I was like can you please talk about the fact you siblings were in a relationship killed themselves together. I mean a case like that would be news in my country for months, and the fact that this was taken very casual in the book, was weird to me. I did like the fact they could understand the other situations and challenge to be better and upfront their mechanisms of defense. I did like how sex was a very present theme in their lives because is a teenager thing contrary to many ya contemporary books out there. And the sex scene we get was so cute but real. I loved how the author showed us the different ways people deal with grief, from small habits they make to full-on bad decisions. But I still felt a bit unsatisfied by the end of the book, I wanted more of this theme. A factor I did enjoy was how this is after seven years of the death of their siblings, but grief is still marking their current lives. I recommend this book if you are in the mood of a YA contemporary that deals with a heavier subject but stills fall in the light-reads section.

Since this program started, nearly everyone I know has written to their soulmate and found something, or rather, someone, amazing. I kept wondering why you never reached out, but maybe you have never even heard of this program. Trust me, whoever you are, you deserve more than me. Regardless, I hope you find happiness from someone who can actually give it to you, and I wish you a Happy Christmas. That is, if you celebrate Christmas. I want to know you no matter who you are. I could be anyone, even a mass murderer. I like to think that if these letters work out, we could even spend Christmas together. Harry rushed to open it, and when he took the letter and sent the owl off, he saw that it was an OSA letter and his heart skipped a beat. The bed was made and it seemed that he had left for the day, which was odd, since it was still very early, and he had been up late organizing his books. And, in my opinion, it is presumptuous of you to think that while you could be a mass murderer, I could not be. Of course, like you, I only point that out for the sake of argument, and I am most certainly not a mass murderer. But I am by no means a good person. I am a horrible, horrible person and you should not waste your time with me. I killed someone in a war and it haunts me everyday. It breaks my heart to think that you have to carry the weight of your mistakes even as you try to make up for them. All I want to do is lighten that weight and prove to you that you can be loved despite that. And I hope you know that having done horrible, horrible things does not make you a horrible, horrible person. I can tell that you have a good heart just by your statement that you would send me a puppy to keep me company on Christmas. Dear Soulmate, I have to admit, I am surprised by you. When I used to think of who you might be, I imagined a perfect person with no flaws whatsoever. I agree now that we should keep sending letters. Especially since they make you smile. I had, uh, a Christmas card to send. Draco pushed Goyle away with a laugh. Draco left the room to read the letter alone, not able to keep a smile off his face. Dear Soulmate, I must, unfortunately, inform you that your comment about my letters making you smile did indeed go to my head and all day I have been strutting around with a proud look on my face. My friends tell me that I look ridiculous. By the way, my offer to spend Christmas with you still stands. Of course, I will still understand if you want to remain anonymous. When he returned to his room after helping Goyle with the last of his gifts, he found Potter already inside on his bed, flipping through a gift catalog. He tucked the letter in his bedside table drawer and hummed as he looked for a book from the uber-organized bookshelf. My roommate has been forcing me to spend time with him. We walked through the snow and went sledding. Have you ever been sledding? He and I were laughing practically the entire day. Concerning Christmas, please do not send me a puppy. However, now that I give more thought to the idea, I suppose my roommate might help me keep the puppy a secret. I think Padfoot is an odd, yet intriguing, name, by the way. He wanted his letter to get to Draco before it was officially Christmas. Like, the most awesome bloke in the world. He probably has charmingly messed up black hair and enchantingly bright green eyes. Does he play Quidditch too? Perhaps he was even the youngest Seeker in a century. Luckily, I think he likes you despite your less than par Seeker skills. I think he likes you as much as I do. He probably wants to buy you a puppy and spend Christmas with you just like I do.

This is short for it is nice to meet you. Glad to meet you. This is short for I am glad to meet you. Generally, they mean the same thing. When meeting someone usually, for the first time, it is a positive experience. As such, I am glad has a bit more of a personal touch, I think: The difference is subtle, though, and probably most people might not notice it. Compare for instance these two sentences: I like the weather today. They roughly mean the same thing, but the second one is more personal. And of course, if I like weather that is not usually considered nice, they may mean something different. Nice to see you. Short for it is nice to see you, you use this when you meet someone you already know; as a rule of thumb, use meet when you meet someone for the first time, use see when you are acquainted with them. Nice to found you. This sentence is grammatical, but it means you enjoy creating someone. If you mean you are happy about finding someone, make sure you use the verb find, not the verb found. Nice to find you here! Glad that I found you! These are both correct uses of find, and express happiness about having encountered someone at this specific location. Glad to is followed by an infinitive, so glad to found you would refer to the verb found as we see it in the foundation of a company, the Founding Fathers and the founder of a city. The man who founded a city is not the same as one that found it!
