A common complaint of new pipe smokers is the hot pipe, and tongue bite. Together, we will review a few points which hopefully, will result in easing that problem. That seemed to make the old-timers laugh when they would see that. It had been commonly known throughout the planet where tobacco pipes are encountered, that any, new pipe, or overly reamed pipe, would require it to be broken in. The Rule of Thirds. Making sure the pipe is clean, run your finger under water and completely wet the inside of the bowl, without drowning it, of course. Remember, in this case, less, is more. So go easy and pinch your bowl offerings in a way that would make Uncle Scrooge smile with admiration. Bring your source of flame to where you like it, and get the pipe lit, not a raging forest fire, just lit. Slowly, and easily, gently draw the smoke. Use your hand to make a flue damper on your pipe bowl chimney. You can use a thumb, the first two fingers, or the palm, to regulate the air flow. This is helpful especially if you over pack the tobacco too tight. Breathe with your stomach muscles. Draw the smoke easy with long volume, and you are now doing a number of things. You are teaching yourself relaxed breathing which will effectively reduce stress, and breaking in your pipe. By pre-wetting, you reduce the possibility of burnouts. Repeat this at a very minimum of three times, better at five, best at ten cycles. Your pipe must rest and cool between smokes, a minimum of a half hour or until dead-cold to your touch. You can hasten the cooling off process simply by placing your pipe into a glass ashtray. Glass is a heat sink. Cold absorbs heat, for all the science majors. Bear in mind, you must, smoke whatever the loading cargo of pipe tobacco, to the very heel, each time. All these pre-lined carbon offerings have a raunchy taste. A pipe needs to be properly broken in, no matter what. A pipe that smokes lousy, can be corrected by thoroughly cleaning it, and mildly leeching with food grade alcohol [proof Everclear, is best. Invite me over if you buy too much! Then follow the process to break in the pipe, using the Rule of Thirds. Gurgly, wet pipes are a nuisance, like a dog that keep doing their business inside the house. You may need to lay paper out and place tobacco on top to dry out overnight, or a few hours. You may need to age other tobaccos a few months. You may need to remove any filter element that is not immediately serviceable. You may need to sand the bowl with grit paper and remove the heavy and often shiny, finish. Your pipe should gently sweat, and breathe. Wipe it on, wait half a minute, then wipe it off. Allow the pipe to dry eight hours between applications. You may want to apply carnuba after the final coat has dried eight hours. Rub the pad of your finger onto the wax and gently massage the wax onto the briar. A few coats will be needed. It cannot be overstated. Anything that you do to your pipe will result in changing the way it will taste and smoke. You may shift where the flavor tones rest. From the top of your tongue, to the back of your mouth, or to the roof of your mouth. In fact, what you light your pipe with, also accounts for taste. I cannot use butane. On many of my previous pipes, I colored the rims, black. With this information, many of the newer and perhaps a few older pipe smokers, may want to purchase other type of pipes. All very nice pipes. Now you know how to properly break a pipe in. Now you know how to correct a pipe that does not smoke well. Now you know how to correct a pipe that does not taste too good. A pipe that smokes beautifully, is priceless to its owner. Tinker, tailor, soldier, spy [BBC television series: I try to live my life with a measure of modesty, and walk quietly before others, humbly. I look like Brittius, resembling George C. I am not a complainer, nor busybody, nor gossip, nor rumor monger. I have earned my place in this world the hard way, and am most honored to bear the exalted title of, Grandpa. The guidelines noted above are very general rules that should give you the best opportunity to make money from playing Texas Hold'em poker without going broke. However there are going to be some exceptions and alterations depending on how and where you play. Bankroll management for pro players. If you intend on taking poker up as your main source of income, the bankroll you would require will be substantially larger than 20 full buy-ins for cash, or 40 buy-ins for tournaments. This is because your living expenses will constantly be taken out of your bankroll and so it has to have the ability to withstand the variance along with the costs of everyday life. Professional players will require a far bigger bankroll than the guidelines set out in this article. If you are constantly dipping into your bankroll to pay for bills and groceries, you may find that occasionally you will not be properly rolled for the limits you are playing at. Bankroll management at short-handed tables. If you play at shorthanded tables, you may notice that there is greater variance than at full ring games. This means that you may consider slightly increasing your bankroll up a few buy-ins if you want to withstand the variance of these games. Style of play and variance. Your playing style can also determine what limits you should play in relation to the size of your bankroll. If you are a tight player then you should expect to receive a slightly reduced variance to that of a loose player, therefore you may be able to afford to reduce the amount of buy-ins in your bankroll. This is because tight players will often only enter pots with strong hands and regularly go to showdowns with winning hands, thus reducing the chances of seeing big losses. Consequently, if you are a loose player and play a large number of pots, you may want to increase the size of your bankroll to absorb the extra variance you may receive. Loose players who play a large percentage of hands will experience more variance than tight players who play a low percentage of hands. Absorbing losses and moving on. Good bankroll management helps you deal with the psychological impact that losses can have on your game. Thanks to your small initial bankroll this looks like a big loss and may cause you to tighten up your game and play "scared poker" because you are afraid to lose more money. Immediately you can see that visually this does not look as bad as the loss in the first instance. Therefore you will feel more comfortable that you have the ability to win back the lost money without feeling the need to change your game. Moving levels and taking shots. There will be times when you have bad runs of cards and good runs of cards. At certain times your bankroll will be too small or too big for the limits you are playing at. If your bankroll drops below 20 full buy-ins, then you should also drop down a level so that you are playing within your bankroll until you have built it back up enough to play at the next level. If you have more than 20 buy ins for the limit above, then it makes sense to move up to that limit if you feel you can beat it. Just be sure to drop back down to the lower limit if you experience significant losses. At some points in your poker career you may fancy moving up a level just to test it out and to see how well you do. This is called "taking a shot". There is no harm in trying this as long as you stick to good bankroll management for most of the time you play poker. Be careful not to get carried away by big wins at the higher level because your bankroll may still be too small to support continued play there. A useful tactic that you can use when taking shots is to not buy in for the full amount at the next level up. You may be interested to read about how quickly you can move up the stakes in poker. If you intend to make money from playing poker, it is essential that you exercise good bankroll management skills. If you do not then you are setting yourself up for frequent losses that you will find hard to prevent, no matter how good you may be at poker. Once again, the safe bankroll requirements to remember are:

You can follow Torelli on Twitter , through Facebook , or via his popular blog. Money is an indispensable tool for a poker player. When you run out you can no longer play. I won, spent and lived as if it would continue forever. Poker though has a way of humbling us. Many dollars later, I learned a painful, expensive lesson: Practically speaking, the more money you have the less you should worry about earning, and the more you should focus on defending. It took me over a year to recover. I moved down dramatically in stakes and ego and did the only thing I could: I focused on skills like how to manage money, assess risk and developed rules for deciding what limits to play or when to take shots. The lure of a big game is that one can win a lot of money in one session. When I have a goal that is motivating, challenging yet attainable, I alter my priorities toward a less impulsive, long-term focus. The logic is this. Right now there is only the present moment and in this moment, there is no change. Whatever downswing I had or hand I lost is in the past. I can always be up or down. The answer is arbitrary and changes depending on how I define the time frame. Winning and losing only exists in your mind. In the present moment you are always even. After all, if I am always even, then each hand is my first hand. The only time I take a streak into consideration is when I feel that my opponents will play differently because of it. I want the game to be comfortable enough not to think twice about going all in on a bluff, but still sting a little if I am caught. Favoring an outcome could affect my decision-making. Remember, the job of a professional is to process the information and use it to make the best decision possible without caring about the result. I can want to win without being emotional. And, after the session is over, I am free to celebrate. And I am also free to care. Regardless of stakes, one must ensure a sufficient supply to withstand the swings of the game. So what swings can you expect? In cash games, at least 60 full buy ins are necessary. More is required for tournaments. I like to use these variance simulators for cash games and tournaments to see just how profound the role of luck is, particularly in tournaments, where the best player in the world can go a lifetime without winning. The former should always be a slice of the pie. What did you learn from your swings? Share your experience in a comment! Your story can inspire others.

A method of sizing bets according to the health of a bankroll, in order to avoid going broke, and to maximize earnings. First published by researcher John Kelly in 1956, the Criterion is applied to all manner of gambling by knowledgeable people. Random variation can easily bust someone who bets too big, even when playing with positive expectation. Under Kelly, you play higher or lower stakes according to how much capital you have. In limit, full-table Texas holdem, one conservative rule of thumb derived from Kelly is that your bankroll should be  $x$  the big bet. With a bankroll of units, it would be an exceptionally rare statistical event to go broke due to random fluctuations. It can be mathematically shown that Kelly bankrolls increase faster than others, even when playing with the same statistical edge. Kelly ONLY applies to situations where you have a mathematical edge that is, you are a net winning player. No kind of bet adjustments will save negative expectation players. The calculations can get rather involved, but for non-math heads, the rule is sufficient. For short-handed limit holdem,  $bb$  is one recommendation. For heavy duty math, go to the articles section at BJ Math. The all-important unpaired high card in a hand used to settle ties. If no one has a kicker higher than a board card, then it really is a tie. Or more precisely, the kicker is the highest board card, and everyone possesses it. The high card in a flush is referred to as a kicker because it serves the same role in ranking flushes of the same suit. Rule variant where the winner of two pots in a row is required to post a blind, and the limits double. House rules will vary. Used in a kill game. To check or pass. Derived from rapping the table to signify passing.
