Google Images. The most comprehensive image search on the web.

Culture So I put Google and Bing in the ring: So I tried it. With an interesting result. Called Bing It On , the promotion asks you to offer up a search and then look at a side-by-side comparison of the results, in which the identities of the search engines are hidden. Then you vote on which results are better. You do this several times, in a best-of-five-searches challenge. How could one resist? It is in the nature of my business that I am forced to Google my own name. So I started there. One search offered images that were of me. The other, sadly, offered images only one of which was of me. I searched "Reasons for living. But I figured if these two engines had true sensitivity, they would fight to give me meaningful answers. Again, one was better than the other. Both gave far too much value to a song by Duncan Sheik called "Reasons for Living. How could this search engine know? I chose "Is Bing better than Google? I expected it to be entirely obvious which algorithm was going to offer me a hosanna toward one or the other home team. Fourth, I thought of something topical. I merely searched "Bill Clinton. So again I called it a draw. Finally, I offered something entirely enigmatic. If I was going to fall in love with one of these two, might one show a little wit and imagination? So I searched "Tell me what I should do next. And this was the point at which the search engines truly had me flummoxed. One offered me, as the first result: This was impersonal enough. But it was nothing compared with the other search engine, which merely showed its political skirts. For its first result was "Tell the world, what should Obama do next? Begone with you, Google. Yes, this was Google. You might now wonder who won. I had declared three winners and two ties. It was Google that knew I had discussed living in Spain. You might imagine I did this by Gmail. You might imagine that I had Googled something about living in Spain. Neither is the case. So, in this instance, it was close. Yet the Googlies had it. The folks at Bing were depressed. When they presented my results, they said: BingItOn asked me to offer it a rematch.

Search the world's information, including webpages, images, videos and more. Google has many special features to help you find exactly what you're looking for.

Ashish Mundhra 22 Nov Customized Google background images on the homepage was one of the best things about Google search, but not anymore. With effect from November 16 , Google has removed the feature and this is what they have to say. Background images on the Google homepage gave users the ability to select images to appear in place of the classic, minimalist experience. As we focus our efforts to build a more streamlined Google Search page for everyone, we will be unable to offer this customization. If the chatter on the forums is anything to go by, a huge number of users are going to miss the Google custom background feature big time. But today I will show you a simple workaround to get the background image back on almost all the modern day browsers except Internet Explorer of course. Now when you open your Google homepage you will again see the link, change background image at the bottom left corner of the screen. However, when you click on it this time the Chrome background image extension will open up. You can now select images from Flickr or give the direct URL of the image on the web to use. If you want to use a personal photo as a background, you can use the photos that you have uploaded on Picasa and are available publically. However I would suggest you to use a site like Imgur to host the image and then use the direct link in the extension. Background Image on Google in Firefox For the time being there is no direct add-on you can install on Firefox to get back the background image. We will be using a Greasemonkey script to enable the feature in Firefox. Having done that, install Google Background userscript and open Google homepage in a new tab. You will now see the Change background link on Google homepage in Firefox. Click on it and provide the URL of the image you would like to use. Safari and Opera You can use the script we have used on Firefox for Opera and Safari as well, however you will have to make arrangements for the browser to support user-scripts. Safari users can use the Greasemonkey kit to install and use custom JavaScript. You can refer to this article on Simple Help if you need help in installing Greasemonkey kit on Safari. Opera users can refer to this one to enable the script. Conclusion So that was how we can re-enable the Google Background Image in most of the modern day browsers and continue to use Google as the default homepage. Why do you think it took this decision?
