

Many decide that a hamster or gerbil is the best choice as a small pet in the home. There are a few noted differences between the two, which can help one make the decision about the best individual choice. One of the primary differences between the hamster and the gerbil is socialization needs.

On the surface hamsters are cuter but when you get to know them, gerbils seem to have real personality. We go on a lot of vacations. I also have fish and clean their tanks quite often. My cousin had a hamster and the first time I met it it bit me a lot. That might be because I grabbed it right away and the next time I saw it it was cuddly. Unfortunately, her little brother let it out. If I were to get one, what are the things I should know before making my final decision? So should I get a hamster? I kept the other one until today it died. I got them both from a pet store, and the first one I liked more because it actually slept at night, and would easily let you pick it up. The second one though was a little more hyper and nocturnal, chewed everything, and would even bite me! What do you all think? I miss him so much! But this article was very helpful! I am thinking about getting a pair of gerbils, although my mom will only let me get female because my male hamster peed all over the room! I would love to get one black gerbil and one hairless, so if anybody knows of any let me know! My doggie watches Ninja my hammy all day. Ninja does not get scared. He also chases Illa the dog and then Illa will chase him. My hamster is a black bear and my dog is a jack russell. They get along great. Do you agree with them? In fact, my two are most active during the night! I find that many captive gerbils will imitate the situation around the cage, giving the appearance of being diurnal as most people are more active during the day. I am, however, more active at night and my gerbils are, too. One of mine gets out of his nest once during the day at about 3 or 4 p. The other is most active between 11 p. My hamsters bit me a lot during the taming process and then a lot in their old age. I will never have hamsters again but plan on having gerbils for many years to come. Anyway, with past experiences we have hamsters fight and eat each other, which is gross. But i think me and my sister are getting separate cages. If i were to get a hamster instead of a gerbil, what type should we get? Gerbils are very nice if taken care of properly but are a lot more mischievous than hamsters. Also, i think they have a longer average life span. All the people i know with hamsters had them for two or three years. My gerbils died in May at the age of four and a half. I miss and love him. And i find that their personality truly depends on the way they were raised. He was about three inches long! He had been held since i got him and he was my everything. He cuddled even if i woke him up because i was so anxious to hold the cute little fur ball. I took seasonal pictures of him ex. But i want to try again. Sorry for my long boring story, but I recommend this percent! One might end up killing the other!

2: Can Gerbils Live in Hamster Cages? – Rodent Zone

On an average, gestation lasts 16 to 18 days for Syrian hamsters, 18 to 21 days for Russian Dwarf hamsters, 21 to 23 days for Chinese hamsters and 23 to 30 for Roborovski hamsters. Litters: You can expect between four and six little gerbils (pups) in a single litter.

There are very striking differences between the two rodents which we can discuss here. When talking of the differences between gerbils and hamsters, one of the primary differences can be seen in their socialization. Gerbils are rodents that are social creatures whereas hamsters have a solitary character. It is hard to keep single gerbils as pets, and they need a friend while in captivity. On the other hand, hamsters can just stay all alone in their captivity. Now looking at the physical characteristics, gerbils have soft and fur covered tails. On the other hand, hamsters are virtually tailless. Gerbils also have a long snout which has a resemblance to rats. Hamsters have large cheek pouches. Gerbils also have long hind legs, and they love to stand on their legs. On the contrary, hamsters do not like to stand on their legs. There are also differences in the sleeping patterns of both gerbils and hamsters. Hamsters sleep during the daytime which means that they are nocturnal rodents. On the contrary, gerbils are crepuscular which means that they are active during dusk and dawn. When keeping these rodents, it should be considered that gerbils cannot withstand overheating. So it is better that the room temperature is maintained steady if you have gerbils. Hamsters are not known to be sensitive to overheating. Though these two rodents can be raised not to bite, the hamster is known to be little more prone to biting. There is not much difference in the diet between gerbils and hamsters. However, gerbils are known to survive entirely on a vegetarian diet than are the hamsters. There are about gerbil subspecies and around 25 hamsters subspecies. Gerbils have soft and fur covered tails. However, gerbils are known to survive entirely on vegetarian diets than are the hamsters. If you like this article or our site. Please spread the word.

3: Gerbils Vs. Hamsters: What's The Difference

Hamsters and gerbils are popular pocket pets, and they're both suitable for kids. If you're considering one of these small pets for your family, weigh the pros and cons to determine which rodent would be best for your kids. Consider the amount of care and type of companionship such pets require, and.

Having a hamster or gerbil as a pet can be a fun experience but, before you make a decision, you should learn more about the pros and cons of owning each animal. Are These Animals Friendly? Even though gerbils and hamsters are popular pet choices, the latter is not too fond of captivity. However, gerbils will make great pets as long as you buy more than one. Of course you have the option to purchase a single gerbil but since they are social animals you should purchase two so they can bond with each other. If you do choose to purchase multiple hamsters and gerbils, it is a good idea to purchase two males. Female gerbils and female hamsters are aggressive with each other, but gerbil and hamster males get along well with one another. If you choose to buy a male and female gerbil or hamster, they should not be housed together, especially at a young age. You may also be interested to know that hamsters breed quickly. Gerbils are ideal pets for children who have little or no experience caring for a small animal. This is due to the fact that gerbils are active throughout the day and rarely bite. Hamsters, however, do not like to be petted or held. Hamsters will bite when they are held or if they become irritated. And, although hamster bites do not cause serious danger, the bites are often painful. If you have young children, a hamster may not be the right pet choice for your family.

Inexpensive Maintenance
It is not expensive to purchase a hamster or gerbil, nor do you need a large budget to maintain them as pets. Most hamster cages come assembled, as well as any cage accessories you might want to purchase for your pet. Keeping a gerbil or hamster cage clean is also simple to do and it does not cost a lot of money. When it pertains to these pets, their litter and bedding materials are the most expensive part of owning either of the two.

Sleeping Patterns
You should know the sleeping patterns of any pet before making a purchase. If you want to sleep well during the night, a hamster is not the right choice for you. Since hamsters are nocturnal, they will spend most of the day sleeping, and their nights will be spent playing with hamster toys or running on the hamster wheel inside their cage. Hamsters do not like to be woken up for any reason, even to play. Gerbils are diurnal; therefore, they will not interrupt your sleep by digging or moving around in their cage. Gerbils like to play during the day, which can be fun for you and your children.

Escaping the Cage
Sometimes, regardless of how attentive you are, gerbils and hamsters escape their cages. When a hamster escapes his cage, he will be difficult to find and capture. You should know that hamsters enjoy chewing on furniture and wiring. So, if your pet hamster escapes his cage and he chews on the wires in your home, it could cause a house fire. Gerbils are also hard to find once they escape, which is why you must purchase an escape-proof cage for either of these little critters. Remember that owning a gerbil or hamster will require some of your time, money, and patience. Overall, gerbils and hamsters can make great pets. But they are not the right choice for every pet owner which is why you should weigh the pros and cons before choosing one or two in the case of gerbils to bring home to meet the family! At first glance, they share several similarities, such as ever-growing incisor teeth, tiny claws that indulge their passion for digging and burrowing, and an appetite for protein with some seeds, fruits and veggies added in. Short is a key descriptor for the stout-bodied hamster: On its wide feet, hamsters sport a darling plodding waddle when walking. They have longer, pointed noses, similar to a rat; long hind legs on which they love to stand and longer tails. Some say that their full cheeks can double the size of their heads! Hamsters have spacious cheek pouches where they can store food. The average pet gerbil matures to 5 or 6 inches long, not including the 3- to 4-inch-long tail, and weighs 2 to 4 ounces by adulthood. The most common pet hamsters range from dwarfs at 2 to 4 inches long about 1. Color Combinations Both hamsters and gerbils come in a variety of colors. Hamsters can have short or long hair ranging in color, texture and pattern. Colors range from white to cinnamon to brown to gray to black. Some are decorated with a dark stripe down the middle of their backs, while others have a white band of fur around their bellies. Behavioral Differences Personality can be a critical part of the decision-making process when adding a pet to the family. Gerbil owners describe them as intelligent, inquisitive and active pets. In fact, Hanna says they are incredibly interested in people. They also will entertain themselves by digging, gnawing and shredding provided materials for nesting. Gerbils are social critters and enjoy the company of other gerbils. And owners caution against startling or waking them prematurely, as they can be quite grumpy. When active, hamsters also enjoy constructing burrows complete with chambers for nesting and storing their food hoards. Playing Well With Others A big contrast between these popular pet rodents is their sociability. Most hamsters are solitary and territorial, even fighting to the death at times. This will give them the chance to interact but also get away and have some alone time. Hanna recommends getting a pair or group and suggests even numbers. Care Differences Both gerbils and hamsters need a clean and well-ventilated cage with a solid base, plenty of bedding for burrowing, a water bottle, chew toys and an exercise wheel. Experts agree that an 8-inch wheel is the perfect size for gerbils and hamsters to get their exercise on. For hamsters, Ramsey recommends at least 3 feet of unbroken floor space. For commercial food, Hanna said to look for 14 to 15 percent protein and a mix of grain types. Hamsters average 2 years while gerbils average 3. In some instances, both critters have lived beyond 4 years, but that is rare. Sandy Chebat Featured Image:

Gerbil vs hamster - which one makes a better pet? For that matter, if you looked at both species side by side, do you think you could identify the hamster gerbil difference?

Gerbils vs Hamsters. The lifespan and other interesting facts about gerbils. Gerbils average lifespan is two to three years, but some have been reported to live up to eight years. Gerbils live in colonies in underground tunnels, sometimes 2 or 3 meters long. They breed throughout the year and produce a litter of about 6 young. At Cub Creek Science Camp we have a small colony of Gerbils for summer campers to play with and hold. At Science Camp campers will learn how to tell the difference between our small furry mammals, such as Gerbils and Hamsters. Gerbils look very similar to Hamsters but there are several differences. Gerbils have a long furry tail but hamsters have a short hairless stub for a tail. Gerbils need the society of other gerbils but Hamsters are solitary creatures. Gerbils will stand up high on their back legs using their tail for balance but it is much harder for the Hamster to do that. Gerbils vs Hamsters Even though both are rodents that are quite popular as pets, gerbils and hamsters do have some striking differences which separate the behavior of the two species to a great extent. For instance, gerbils are social creatures, while hamsters exhibit solitary behavior. It is important to know the differences between these two, in order to decide which one would be more suitable for you.

Gerbil Facts A gerbil is a small burrowing rodent, typically, characterized by strong hind legs adapted for leaping. It is found in various countries including, China, India and Turkmenistan etc. Gerbils are also exported as exotic pets to European and American nations. There are around sub-species of this rodent. On an average, gerbil species can grow to a length of 6 to 12 inches, and weigh approximately, 2 to 3 ounces. Though, most of the gerbil sub-species are diurnal in nature, some of them do exhibit crepuscular traits. They are social animals, which are found in groups, in the wild. Although they are regarded as pests in many countries, some species of gerbils, such as the Clawed Jird, are quite popular as pets.

Hamster Facts Hamsters are small burrowing rodents, typically characterized by large cheek pouches and a short tail. These rodents are crepuscular in nature, which means, they are most active at dusk and dawn. They spend the entire day burrowing in the ground, in order to avoid being caught by predators. There are around 25 sub-species of hamsters. Being omnivorous in nature, hamsters generally, feed on vegetables, nuts, berries, fruits etc. As they are very easy to breed, hamsters are used as lab specimens in various countries. Hamsters as pets are also quite popular in various parts of the world.

Gerbil Vs Hamster As we said earlier, gerbils and hamsters differ from each other to a great extent, as far as socialization is concerned. Solitary hamsters seldom prefer company and if two hamsters are kept together as pets, they are bound to engage in a struggle. On the other hand, gerbils, which are social, can be kept in each others company. Hamsters are nocturnal creatures who like to spend the entire day sleeping, while gerbils are diurnal creatures active during the day. Their appearance plays a major role, when it comes to gerbil vs hamster comparison. The gerbils sport a long, soft tail, while the hamster is virtually tailless. Owing to their long snout, gerbils resemble rats more than hamsters. Though, both the rodent species require daily exercise, gerbils tend to be more active than hamsters. Ideally, you will have to provide your pet, whichever is your choice, a wheel in the cage to stay healthy. Gerbils can get dehydrated in high temperatures, and hence, you will have to provide your pet gerbil with necessary surroundings. Pet gerbils seldom bite, but pet hamsters do bite, especially if woken during the day.

Gerbils Vs Hamsters Two of the most popular small pets available in pet shops are hamsters and gerbils. Traditionally hamsters have been viewed as the best pet - especially for children - but is that really the case?

Tweet on Twitter Gerbil vs hamster – which one makes a better pet? For that matter, if you looked at both species side by side, do you think you could identify the hamster gerbil difference? And most kids only know they are cute and small and fast and so, SO interesting! Learning more about a gerbil vs hamster is a great idea before making a commitment to care for one of these little mammals. What is the difference between a hamster and a gerbil? They look a lot alike! One of the first questions to tackle is: These two terms can be used so interchangeably it really is a fair question! Even though they do have lots of similarities, a gerbil or hamster are not one and the same – they are two different rodent species. All about the Gerbil The species of gerbil most commonly kept as a pet is the Mongolian gerbil Meriones unguiculatus. These gerbils tend to be hardy and resilient. These sociable mammals are nocturnal, sleeping the day away and waking up to become more active as the sun sets. This is likely an evolutionary tactic to keep out of sight of predators, who see a wild gerbil not as an entrancing playmate so much as a tasty appetizer! Mongolian gerbils have big ears – the better to hear any hungry predator who tries to creep up on them – and sizeable back feet, the better to stand up, look around, or run away with! They also have large eyes and a long furry tail. A newer pet gerbil is called the fat-tailed gerbil. These gerbils have – you guessed it – wider tails without any hair on them. In the wild, the gerbil would store extra fat reserves in the tail. Hamsters also have very distinctive cheeks – they can stuff them so full their heads look like they are literally twice as large as they really are! Unlike with pet gerbils, which really do predominantly hail from the Mongolian line, pet hamsters can be Syrian or dwarf, and there are several dwarf hamster species http: Hamsters are stockier in their body and legs than gerbils are. However, hamsters, like gerbils, are nocturnal, which means they are more active after the sun sets. Gerbil vs hamster size When you compare gerbil vs hamster vs guinea pig size, the guinea pig comes out the clear size winner. But once the much larger guinea pig is eliminated, size-wise, the gerbil vs hamster reveals that the hamster generally comes out the size winner. This is at least the case when comparing Syrian hamsters against Mongolian gerbils! However, when comparing the dwarf hamster vs gerbil, you will notice the gerbil looks like a heavyweight next to its tiny dwarf hamster counterpart! Syrian hamsters and gerbils can be easier to handle, mostly because they are big enough to hold securely. Smaller dwarf hamsters are so tiny and wriggly and fast, they can easily escape if removed from their habitat! Once gone, these miniature escape artists can be very, very hard to recapture. Gerbil size At maturity, a gerbil might weigh anywhere from 50 to 60 grams 1. Hamster size A Syrian hamster, the largest hamster breed, can weigh anywhere from 87 to grams 3. In contrast, a Roborovski dwarf hamster, the smallest dwarf hamster species, will only weigh 20 to Gerbil vs hamster lifespan Gerbils in captivity can live from two to five years. Hamsters in captivity can live between two and four years, depending on species. Gerbil vs hamster colors Whether you choose a gerbil or hamster as a pet, you can look forward to having a very cute pet to look at! Even better, gerbils and hamsters can also exhibit as much visual variety in their coat color, coat type and eye color as cats and dogs can! Generally speaking, gerbils may be two-toned one color on top and another color on the belly or they may have a pattern spots, agouti. Gerbil coat colors can include brown, grey, orange, yellow, cream, nutmeg, red, silver, slate, white or even orange! Gerbil eye colors can be ruby red, pink or dark brown or black. Hamster colors Hamsters can come in a dazzling array of coat colors, from pure winter white to black, grey, orange, chocolate brown, champagne, cream, sable, rust, cinnamon, golden, and many more pretty permutations. Coat patterns can range from solid to two-toned one color on top and one color on the belly , agouti, spotted, banded, dappled, roan and tortoiseshell. Hamsters also have one other interesting variation: Hamster eye colors can range from dark brown or black to ruby to pink. Gerbil vs hamster socialization It is vital to look at the hamster vs gerbil difference before you bring your new pet home! This is because, depending on whether you choose a gerbil vs hamster, you may need to plan for one or at least two new pets! Gerbil socialization in captivity Gerbils are quite social in the wild and in captivity as well. Unless you are adopting a senior gerbil that is used to living alone, it is much preferable to keep pet gerbils in pairs. It is also advisable to keep same-gender gerbils together. Two females is always a good pairing and two male littermates can be a great choice as well. If you do keep a male and a female together, you will need to be prepared for lots of tiny hamster babies starting almost immediately! Luckily, as long as the gerbils in question are at least 8 weeks old, it is pretty easy to tell a female and a male apart. Hamster socialization in captivity There can be a significant socialization differences between a hamster and a gerbil depending on the species of hamster you are keeping. For example, the most popular pet hamster species, the Syrian hamster sometimes also called the golden hamster or the teddy bear hamster , is notorious for getting into fights when housed with other hamsters. You should always house a Syrian hamster by itself. On the other hand, dwarf hamsters can usually be housed in pairs or even groups if they are littermates. This is best done when your dwarf hamsters are young, as an older dwarf hamster who is used to being alone might not be so keen on having a stranger dumped into his habitat one day! For more detailed information on the socialization needs of different hamster species, we recommend you browse over to this informative article! Gerbil vs hamster cages Both the gerbil and the hamster have specific housing requirements. When these are met, you will have a much better chance of having a healthy gerbil or hamster pet! Gerbil cages Gerbils are natural diggers, chewers and adventurers. They have really strong hind legs and stabilizing long tails for jumping, and they are very active and curious! What this means for you, the gerbil owner, is that you really, really need a gerbil-proof habitat. A glass aquarium or metal habitat with a smooth bottom are really the only safe choices. So gerbils need plenty of bedding to dig and nest in. Size-wise, your gerbil cage should reflect the number of occupants. The Humane Society of the United States <http://www.humanesociety.org>: Add 5 additional gallons for every additional gerbil. Hamsters, like gerbils, love to chew and dig and climb. So like gerbils, your hamster will need a solid, escape-proof habitat, and this is especially important when keeping the tiny dwarf hamsters! Plastic, glass or metal cages with smooth bottoms are the best choices. Gerbil vs hamster health Both gerbils and hamsters are generally considered to make for hardy, healthy pets. However, like all animal species, gerbils and hamsters do have certain known health issues that can crop up from time to time. Gerbil health Gerbils are typically considered a hale and hardy family pet. They are resilient even in the face of inexpert handling by young pet carers, especially when housed with other gerbils for company. Gerbils can suffer from dental disease. Providing lots of chewable treats is a good way to prevent dental issues. Gerbils can develop inner ear masses obstructive ear disease or aural cholestratoma. Veterinarians estimate epilepsy may affect up to 40 percent of gerbils. The best way to avoid bringing home a pet with inherited epilepsy is to choose your breeder carefully. Hamster health Perhaps the most common issue that affects hamsters is dental disease. Providing lots of chewable toys can help keep the teeth safely filed. Wet tail disease, a. It is caused by bacteria and can be fatal very quickly when left untreated. Hamsters can also be prone to developing tumors, both benign and cancerous. Tumors are more apt to form on glands than anywhere else and always require prompt veterinary care. What is a better pet hamster or gerbil? So what do you think? 7: What are the Differences Between a Hamster and a Gerbil?

Hamster vs Gerbil Hamster and gerbil are both classified as rodents but in different families. Their appearances with many other morphological and behavioural characteristics vary from each other. However, many think that hamsters are a group of gerbils, and that is not correct at all.

Well, yes and no. Gerbils and hamsters have a lot of generic things in common; they are both rodents, both fit in your hand and they are both sold in pet stores – they even both eat similar-looking food. But that is generally where the similarities end. They can both live in each others set-ups of course short term although the gerbils are worse off in almost all cases – but neither would be best suited to the others – or you even – as they have such different requirements. They are a bit like chalk and cheese. Hamsters are generally solitary-living slow-moving fur balls who like a neat tidy cage. They have a large body and short legs made for tunnel walking and not for speed. If they can stay in the same place for 3 years – they would love that. They sleep usually all day in their cute brightly-coloured plastic house on a shallow layer of woodshavings just enough to cover the plastic base and occasionally – if the mood takes them – they will move all the shavings over to one corner of the tank for no good reason. Photo by Lyn Lomasi They like moving around in tubes horizontally but also vertically – a feat they achieve due to their giant girth where they push against the sides of the tubes with their immense bodies. Although they have sharp teeth – and often use them on their owners and friends – they rarely use them for chewing anything other than food. So the ideal hamster cage is? As you guessed it – the ideal hamster cage therefore is something that can be small or divided up into small parts connected by plastic tubes running either across or up and down. The whole thing and everything in it can be made of brightly-coloured plastic for ease and to look cute and the cage bases are minimal and only there to hold the thing together. Photo by rkimpelj Hamster cages often have a mesh or barred wheel if there is space for one – and if they extend upwards, there is usually a plastic tube or plastic slope to the next level – usually also made of plastic. As a result of all this compartmentalizing and connecting things – quite a lot of hamster cages are initially very very small – and it is up to you to buy all the other parts of the kit to make the place acceptable. Gerbils are generally group-living fast-moving sleek machines who like the messiest-looking environment a human has ever seen to the gerbils though it is totally organised. They have a slim body with giant back legs built for speed and digging. If they had to stay in the same place for 3 minutes – they would hate that. Do you know how long it took me to get this picture below! They sleep a short while then wake a short while then sleep a short while again – on and off all day and night. They usually build their nest in a wooden hut underneath a good few inches of bedding enough to bury the house in in the first place and very often – as is nearly always the case – they will rearrange virtually all of their bedding and eat through any toys overnight making the whole cage look different every 24 hours. As they need very much bedding enough to bury half their cage contents and to make tunnels there is always a need for a deep glass or plastic base. Gerbils love to dig and move things around, so the contents of their cage are usually kicked back and forth throughout the day and night, every day and every night. They LOVE moving around underground or in tunnels – as that is where they feel safest. Seeing anything in common yet? Not really, just their overall size. As you guessed it – the ideal gerbil cage therefore is something completely different to a hamster cage. You can have a smooth edged hard plastic with no starting point for chewing – and edges are doomed. There are however a few exceptions as all the other alternatives are even less safe. With gerbils – you often have to replace everything in their cages on a regular basis – nothing will last you their entire life. However, you should always be looking out for the safety of your gerbil and allowing it to act in a natural way for a gerbil. Gerbils should not have a mesh or barred wheel as it can trap their tail and even break it entirely off – they need a solid large wheel – 10 inches plus in diameter due to their giant back legs. The best ones are made of solid plastic like in the image above with no bars anywhere. They may eventually chew these and they will need to be replaced, but if you want a wheel – these are the safest. If gerbil cages are extended upwards, you should try to avoid plastic shelves and ladders at all costs – chewing it makes it sharp, it will harbour germs and could get stuck in your gerbils mouths. So, can gerbils live in hamster cages? Nearly all basic hamster cages are too small for gerbils, have the wrong base to bar ratio and have too much plastic in them – but sometimes alternatives need to be used. I would rather a gerbil was safe in a smaller hamster cage than at risk of injury or escape in something larger and less suitable. So, here are the ins and outs of those cage types: A traditional hamster cage made totally of wire with a shallow coloured tray like a cat litter tray can safely hold a pair of gerbils and they can live in there with only a few adaptations. A traditional bird cage – why not – it is the same design as the hamster cages except for bar direction? An enclosed hamster cage like a Ferplast Duna and upwards in size is much better than a wire cage as it will contain all their mess and they can have deeper bedding, but it has a load of plastic that will eventually get eaten. The hole where the water bottle goes is the weakest point – so you will need to have it secured at all times – 30 minutes and they could be out of there! A modular hamster cage made of all little sections and filled with weak points like plastic stoppers and plastic tubes cannot safely hold a pair of gerbils for any length of time. ALSO they would remember where they escaped from last time – and do it again over and over. A new trendy hamster cage may well be more of a gerbil-friendly set-up – as they are making the sides solid and a cage as only part of the top – basically just like a gerbilarium. Large wooden hamster cages are even better – things like the PawHut Large Wooden hamster cage is perfect for gerbils apart from the fact it is wood and they will eventually chew it to pieces – but while it lasts it would be GREAT. Often guinea pig habitats are too easily escaped from by gerbils as they have bars based on the habits and size of a guinea pig. Shame that most guinea pigs and rabbit cages are too small for rabbits and guinea pigs – but with smaller bars or more solid sides could be great for gerbils and hamsters! Animals are SO pigeon-holed into habitats no pun intended. Basically, as long as it is safe for gerbils – you can use it short term; but if it is larger, deeper and wood and cardboard filled you can use it long term!

Both gerbils and hamsters need a clean and well-ventilated cage with a solid base, plenty of bedding for burrowing, a water bottle, chew toys and an exercise wheel. Experts agree that an 8-inch wheel is the perfect size for gerbils and hamsters to get their exercise on.

January 7, found this helpful If you are debating on whether to get a hamster, or a gerbil as a rodent pet, I would suggest you get a gerbil. Unlike Hamsters, who are nocturnal, and the run in that darn wheel that squeaks all night, gerbils are active during the day. These little guys are so interesting to watch. They run around, chew on things, bury food, and other things. Also, hamsters urinate constantly, but Gerbils only urinate every so often, so your gerbil cage almost never smells. Also, if you decide to get a gerbil, I suggest you get two, and if you want a family of gerbils, get a male and female. The babies will grow fur, and run around like crazy while their eyes are still closed. So, I highly recommend a gerbil, because they are a lot of fun for only around six dollars per gerbil. I would say gerbils. They have great personalities. I believe they are the best pet. I would recommend that you not breed them. Because, unless you are lucky enough to be there when the pups come usually early in the morning like 4 am. So I would get two females over males. Males may fight for territory. And I would suggest getting them from the same litter of pups. My two girls, Dixie and Daisy are sisters, and they are inseparable. I think gerbils are way cuter. I am a breeder. I have 7 gerbils right now and I have more arriving in about a 4 days. Hamsters bite too much, and the pee a lot more than gerbils. Also, hamsters are also boring to watch, and they sleep a lot. Gerbils just sleep during the night and you can watch them for hours. So if you get a pet make sure its a gerbil. Gerbils, they do not stink and the do not bite. Hamsters tend to be biters, but not gerbils. The one down side is they do not have cheek pouches to stuff like hamsters. Hamster are way cuter. I have one myself and they smell way better than gerbils. They hardly ever poop or wee, and they are so cute. They actually sleep at night and do not wake you up. So if you want to sleep at night, get a hamster. Rats are the best pets. They are clean, friendly, and just plain sweet. They are the perfect first pets for kids. Gerbils are very cute, I cannot choose which is cuter, but that is opinion. Gerbils are way more intelligent. You can teach a gerbil tricks; it is more difficult with hamsters. Gerbils bit less often as hamsters. Gerbils are up at night; just put them in a different room, that is fine. Plus, my two male gerbils make cute squeaks that put me to sleep easily. My old hamster peed all over my stuffed animals when I was 8. Hamsters are cute, but they smell terrible. I would barely go in the room where my two hamsters were. You can hardly smell Gerbils. Gerbils are very entertaining. They make a new bed every time you clean their cage. Hamsters will just poop on their new toys. If you give your gerbil a toilet paper tube, it is so cute to watch them climb all over it, go through it, watch your two gerbils run into each other and chew it to the center. Gerbils are really fun and cute. They stand up every 5 seconds or so, and they are the cutest when they spin in a circle and take their little seed and munch it as their little eyes close as if they are in heaven. Gerbils can have popcorn, Rice Krispies Treats, Cheerios, and all sorts of things. Hamsters mainly eat sunflower seeds. Gerbils make a much better classroom pet. If you like a pet with personality, get two gerbils of the same gender. If you would like to get bitten hard often, get a hamster. This is my opinion, but the facts say gerbils are great pets, and they are not close to "trouble". Charlie never bite me and was lovable and loved to explore the house in his ball. After he died I bought two male gerbils and I have regretted it hugely. You can pick them up, but not for long as they jump and scratch. They are fun to watch and are sweet as they cuddle and play together, but a hamster will get more attached to you and have more love to give. Even though they are nocturnal and can get up quite late they are there for you when you have finished a busy day and they love a cuddle. I have 2 gerbils. I will not put any animal, gerbil or hamster on the down side. I have had both Gerbil: Whenever I clean the cage they make a new bed design, I love to make little amusement parks with stuff around the house. Bond easily Fluffy and fun to pet I liked to see them stuff their cheeks with food.

HAMSTERS AND GERBILS pdf

At first glance, you might think gerbils and hamsters look about the same. Although similarities abound between these two adorable types of rodents, a closer look reveals some differences. For reasons that range from a gerbil's long tail to a hamster's sleeping habits, these two cuties aren't carbon.
