By helping them approach homework with a strategy when they're young, you'll teach your kids to do that independently later. Allow them to take a break if needed, then guide them back to the homework with fresh focus and energy.

Here are 6 tips to help alleviate homework frustration, and make homework time a more positive experience for both children and parents. Timing Is Everything Imagine spending a full day at work, only to come home and be forced to immediately begin working again. Our kids work hard at school, and need to be given time to decompress when they get home. Allow your child some time to play and relax after school. Be as consistent as possible, allowing flexibility for evening activities when necessary. Create an Environment for Learning Minimize distractions during homework time by turning off the TV and limiting phone calls. Choose a communal space where the family can work together -- and where adults can be available for assistance. Set an example by allowing your children to see YOU reading or working during this time. Honor any "no screen during homework" rules your family might have in place. If everyone in the house is going "screen free," your children will be less likely to feel as though they are missing out by having to complete their homework. Pick up a book or catch up on work as your children study. Your example can set your kids on the path towards life-long learning. Provide Breaks Focused seatwork is a challenge for many children. Providing short breaks can help alleviate frustration, adjust attitudes, and allow your kids to revisit more challenging problems or papers with fresh eyes. Set goals that are reasonable for their age levels and unique learning needs. If your children cannot focus for 15 minutes, have them work for 10, and then allow a small break. Be present without being over-involved. While often well intentioned, hovering can be interpreted as a lack of faith in the children and in their abilities. Your children need to know you believe in them. Stay Positive Point out what your kids are doing well! Be quick to mention their improvements and slow to remark on their mistakes. A word of encouragement is far more motivating than a negative comment. Remember that homework for elementary school students is typically about responsibility and practice. Homework is a way for students to work on developing skills. In many cases, perfection is not expected. Mistakes let teachers know what skills and subject areas need more classroom instruction. Reach Out When your child is really struggling with a new concept, reach out to the teacher. While not all teachers will respond or take action, some will. If asked, some teachers are willing to give parents tips or tools to better understand the homework personally or offer additional help or support for the student at school.

*Do you review your daughter's homework every night? Robinson and Harris's data, published in The Broken Compass: Parental Involvement With Children's Education, show that this won't help.*

During grade school, kids start getting homework for the first time to reinforce and extend classroom learning and help them practice important study skills. By doing homework, kids learn how to: Parents can give kids lots of homework help, primarily by making homework a priority and helping them develop good study habits. Setting Up Shop The kitchen or dining room table is a popular workspace for younger children; they may feel more comfortable being near you, and you can provide encouragement and assistance. Also consider parental controls , available through your Internet service provider ISP , and software that blocks and filters any inappropriate material. But resist the urge to provide the right answers or complete assignments. Here are more tips to help make homework easier for kids: Send the message that schoolwork is a top priority with ground rules like setting a regular time and place each day for homework to be done. Strategize for homework sessions. Teach kids to take stock of how much homework there is and what it involves so they can create a strategy that fits their workloads and temperaments. Some kids might want to tackle the harder assignments first “ when mental energy levels are highest “ while others prefer to get the easier tasks over with. Allow them to take a break if needed, then guide them back to the homework with fresh focus and energy. Most kids first encounter multiple teachers and classrooms in middle school, when organization becomes a key to succeeding. Teach your child how to use a calendar or personal planner to help get organized. Apply school to the "real world. Homework Problems Especially as kids get older, homework can really start to add up and become harder to manage. These strategies can help: Be in touch with teachers. Teachers can tell you what happens in the classroom and how to help your child succeed. You also can ask to be kept in the loop about quizzes, tests, and projects. Encourage kids to reach out. Most teachers are available for extra help before or after school, and also might be able to recommend other resources. Praise your kids for their hard work and effort. The sooner you intervene, the sooner you can help your child get back on track. When Kids Struggle With Homework Consistent complaints about homework or ongoing struggles with assignments could indicate a problem. In some cases, kids simply need to learn and practice better study habits. Be sure your kids are writing down assignments correctly and encourage them to keep a daily homework notebook, which can help both kids and parents know exactly what assignments are due and when. If a particular assignment is giving your child more trouble than others, send a note to the teacher pointing out the difficulties. Laying the Foundation The key to truly helping kids with homework is to know when to step in. Encourage effort and determination “ not just the grades they get.

Helping Your Students with Homework: A Guide for Teachers. Paulu, Nancy; Darby, Linda B., Ed. This guide for elementary and secondary teachers discusses 18 tips for creating meaningful homework assignments that students will complete.

Print What is it about homework that wears families out? Even newbie grade-schoolers, who love doing it at first, often lose their enthusiasm and start stalling. And after a long day, you just want your kiddo to knuckle down so you can get dinner on the table or start the bedtime routine. But playing cop rarely works – micromanaging and nagging only make kids feel stupid or frustrated. Think of yourself as a coach and cheerleader. Their work-like-magic tips are guaranteed to bring harmony back into your homework routine, whether your child is a kindergartner or a fifth-grader, a whiner or a procrastinator! Do It as Early as Possible: Best for Everyone On days when there are no afternoon activities, give your child a time frame – say, between 3 p. This gives her some control over her schedule some kids need a longer break after school, and others need to start right away to keep the momentum going. If you work, that means homework duties will fall to the after-school caregiver. Create a Call List: Best for Forgetters From kindergarten on, kids need a list of three or four classmates they can call on when they forget an assignment, says Ann Dolin, M. The study buddy can read your child the spelling words over the phone, or his mom can snap a pic of the worksheet and text it to you. That alone can help him remember how to do the rest. Then heap on the praise: Try the next one now. Have your child show you similar problems he worked on in class. That may jog his memory so he can retrace the steps. Cut It in Half: If your child is completely lost, you can excuse her entirely. In the other cases, shorten the assignment, says Cathy Vatterott, Ph. Most teachers will be understanding if a student does this once in a while, says Grace, but if your child frequently fails to finish her assignments, there will probably be a consequence. Look how well you wrote your letters in this part! Best for Procrastinators Sometimes a pint-size foot dragger just needs a jump-start. At that point, she can take a short break or keep going – and many kids continue. Best for 3rd- to 5th-Graders Many teachers will break down big projects into a series of deadlines so that children learn to budget time. Together, divide the project into steps, then help her estimate how much time each will take. To get the most out of your calendar, include everything – from basketball practice on Mondays to the reading log every night so you both can plan realistically. Hold off, says Dr. Your process may confuse her even more. You can help your child by talking to her about what she remembers from class and steering her to the textbook.

6: Too much help with homework can hinder your child's learning progress

Homework lets teachers identify what students have absorbed in class, so don't turn it into your assignment. "We like to see mistakes," says Matt Vaccaro, a first-grade teacher in Locust.

Print article For many parents, the subject of math arouses feelings of anxiety — perhaps conjuring up memories of timed tests, difficult concepts, or embarrassing mistakes made in class. If you think of math as something that other people are good at or that has no practical use, your attitude may undermine your ability to coach your child. Take the fear and frustration out of math homework by pointing out how numbers are used in your home on a daily basis. Covering your bases If math makes you nervous, try not to pass on your feelings to your child. Share only what is helpful, not harmful. You may want to rely on a tutor, older sibling, or peer tutor to help your child with math. Check if his school has a peer-tutoring program. Be sure to follow through. Home is where the math is Explore math in everyday life — counting out forks to set the table, pouring from a gallon of milk, telling the time when his favorite TV program begins. When kids realize that math is all around them, they begin to relax and see its meaning in their lives. Show how math is more than learning addition, subtraction, multiplication, and division. Math also teaches us to analyze, reason, and plan. These are useful skills that transfer over to reading and writing as well. Model analytical and mathematical thinking. Be a problem solver, pose questions, and find solutions. Talk about likenesses and differences, and explain your reasoning. Encourage your child to explain his problem-solving process so you can understand his reasoning. When driving to school or the store, talk about how numbers help us determine how fast we drive, the distance traveled, the mileage the car gets per gallon of gas, and how long it will take to get home. Expose your child to money in her early school years. Have her collect coins in a piggy bank and count them out regularly. If she receives an allowance, have her keep track of the amount or start a bank account. Have your child use an analog and a digital watch to learn both methods of telling time. Incorporate games involving numbers and math into playtime — from flash cards for learning basic math facts to board games involving money, time, and logic. Some activities and games can help kids memorize math concepts. Educational video games and learning software can also reinforce math skills, from arithmetic to algebra. Older students may want to use calendars and spreadsheets to plan out their daily or weekly schedules. Modification of homework may increase her motivation and productivity. With her teacher, decide if she needs to do fewer problems, or if she can say the answers out loud and you can write them for her, or if she can check her work with a calculator.

7: Helping Your Gradeschooler With Homework

"Homework is designed to help students reinforce key concepts, process and solidify new information, provide time for extra practice of skills, and reflect on how much they've learned.

Parents can be supportive by demonstrating study and organization skills, explaining a tricky problem, or just encouraging kids to take a break. Parents might even learn a thing or two! Here are some tips to guide the way: Ask about their homework policies and how you should be involved. Set up a homework-friendly area. Make sure kids have a well-lit place to complete homework. Keep supplies — paper, pencils, glue, scissors — within reach. Schedule a regular study time. Some kids work best in the afternoon, following a snack and play period; others may prefer to wait until after dinner. Help them make a plan. Create a work schedule for the night if necessary — and take time for a minute break every hour, if possible. Keep distractions to a minimum. This means no TV, loud music, or phone calls. Occasionally, though, a phone call to a classmate about an assignment can be helpful. Make sure kids do their own work. Parents can make suggestions and help with directions. Be a motivator and monitor. Ask about assignments, quizzes, and tests. Give encouragement, check completed homework, and make yourself available for questions and concerns. Set a good example. Do your kids ever see you diligently balancing your budget or reading a book? Praise their work and efforts. Post an aced test or art project on the refrigerator. Mention academic achievements to relatives. If there are continuing problems with homework, get help. Some kids have trouble seeing the board and may need glasses; others might need an evaluation for a learning problem or attention disorder.
