A large granite statue of him looking into the rest of Ireland at Raholp today overlooks the site. He died at the Abbey of Saul where he began his mission and was administered his dying communion by Bishop Tassach of Raholp. The abbey was desecrated by Lord Leonard Grey in and he was executed three years later for his callous actions. It appears that the relics of the saints remained intact until when the building was being remodelled as Down Cathedral. Accounts given record that the tomb was vandalised and the relics were scattered over the abbey yard prompting the Downpatrick people to hurriedly bury them at their present site. It is said that the town cross was placed on the grave but it was carried off and vandalised. The association of the Kildare family with Ardglass continued for three centuries" Lecale is also recorded under the name of "Ladcathel" as one of the seven counties of the Earldom of Ulster in This action saw the creation of the River Quoile and acres of land around Downpatrick. Strangford Lough bounds the northern edge and the Irish Sea the east and Dundrum inner bay forms the western edge. The soils are mostly light-medium loams , well suited for the production of grain, and it forms one of the most extensively cultivated areas of Northern Ireland. This was also the case historically. Ordnance Survey memoirs of to state that in some parishes, such as Dunsfort and Ballee, the land was almost exclusively used for cultivation, rather than grazing. The low livestock density meant that marl and lime was often used instead of manure. Arthur Young observed that the area was almost completely under grain cultivation largely barley during the late 18th century and that south Lecale was more fertile than the north.
