Biology, anthropology, computational science, and networks in phylogenetic analysis Monday, July 20, The Tree of Architecture The following diagrams are taken from the book A History of Architecture on the Comparative Method for the Student, Craftsman, and Amateur. This book is considered to be "a canonical text that has played a formative role in the education of generations of architects" because it really does "cram everything into a single volume". The first edition of the book appeared in , with the 20th edition appearing in . The first picture is from the 5th edition , and the second one is from the 16th edition . As noted in the first figure, these trees purport to show the "evolution" of the various architectural styles. However, they do no such thing. At the base of the tree trunk is a set of individual architectural styles that apparently led nowhere, while at the crown of the tree several styles are repeated. Each of the latter styles exist on two side-branches from the main trunk, each pair connected by vertical tendrils. So, this is a network, at least. However, the meaning of this network is not immediately obvious. Indeed, even a short perusal of the diagram should lead you to the idea that the meaning is contained more in cultural bias than in the actual history of architecture. The history of the book itself is somewhat complex. Subsequent editions were revised by Banister F. The tone and arrangement of the book was changed with each edition. She notes the following: Until the fourth edition of , A History of Architecture had been a relatively modest survey of European styles. The fourth edition, however, appeared with an important difference: The nonhistorical styles, which unlike others remain undated, are supported by the "Western" trunk of the tree with no room to grow beyond the seventh-century mark. Nonhistorical styles, grouped together, are decorative additions, they supplement the proper history of architecture that is based on the logic of construction. In the posthumously published seventeenth edition of , the two parts were renamed "Ancient Architecture and the Western Succession" and "Architecture in the East", respectively. The nineteenth edition of , on the other hand, consisted of seven parts based on chronology and geographical location. European cultures focused on construction, and they developed their styles through time. Other cultures focused on decoration, and were therefore not a proper part of architecture, and had no historical development. This is what the tree attempts to show. This cultural bigotry was corrected in the final few editions of the book after the Fletchers were no longer involved , where all architectural styles were considered more-or-less equal.
