Among the distinguished ancestors of Principal Colcock have been his father; his great-grandfather, Charles J. Colcock, of the court of appeals of South Carolina, who was president of the bank of the state; and Judge William Smith, of the supreme court of New York. His father was a planter, energetic, of rare good judgment, and of a high order of executive ability; a magnetic personality such as exerts great influence in any city or community. He was the originator of many enterprises of a public nature. From to he was commander of the Third Military district, and colonel of the Third South Carolina cavalry. Horton Colcock was of English extraction. She died when he was eleven years old. Her early training left in him a "desire to do his utmost toward realizing her ambition for him"; and in the fulfilment of this desire he was constantly encouraged by his father. This home influence led him to pursue most assiduously his private studies. His own tastes, too, led him to study and reading; and he was especially interested in mathematics. Books of natural science and stories of adventure and history he enjoyed. After a few years of preparatory training he entered the Holy Communion Church institute in Charleston, taking the classical course; was at the College of Charleston for two years; and later he matriculated at Union college, Schenectady, New York, to pursue a course in civil engineering. From Union he was graduated in , with the degree of C. Upon graduation he was made tutor in Union college, holding this position for three years. Eeturning to his home, he became a planter. In he was appointed to the department of mathematics and sciences at the Porter academy, Charleston, South Carolina. So efficient was his work here that he became head master of the academy in , a position of influence which he still holds. His greatest service to the public has been rendered through his work as a teacher. He intends to edit and publish a series of mathematical text books. Hay, of Barnwell, South Carolina. They have had two children, one of whom is now living, Miss Erroll Hay Colcock. He is affiliated with the Episcopal church. He advises young people to make worthy friends in youth, and so to regulate their conduct in later life as to retain these same friendships. In other cases, consult expediency.
