Share via Email The lures of pop-stardom and space exploration make for seemingly brilliant career choices when you are young. After all, as children we are blank canvases, able to collect and create a multitude of experiences and opinions that make us ideal for our own futures. But thinking back to our childhood dreams, you have to wonder how plausible this idea is. Surely, it must be very few people that end up doing what they dreamed they would when asked the pivotal question, "What do you want to do when you grow up? My sister on the other hand, answered that classic childhood question with similarly classic childish honesty. When she grew up, she wanted to be able "to drink Bacardi Breezers". As adults we know the truth. With fame comes hard work, pressure and a near-constant hounding from the press; with space exploration comes isolation, intense physical conditions and an indelible helping of life-threatening danger. Not the best 9-to-5 career choices. There comes a point in our lives, however, when our ability to do anything and to be anyone comes to pass. When I chose to take no science subjects at A-level, I firmly closed the doors on medicine and my misinformed dreams of marine biology , but opened up a world of opportunities to careers in the arts. But at the age of 21, just four months after graduating, I already feel like my choices are incredibly narrowed. I have varied experience in all sorts of jobs; from writing yoghurt campaigns to tracking down financial criminals, as well as the more standard office and admin work along the way. But do companies really need to employ the same old person to file, copy, print, repeat? All this raises an interesting issue. I still feel very young, know that I have a lot to learn, and just want an opportunity to develop all my skills. What if I want to work as a project manager? I have an excellent English degree and experience that makes me suitable for all these jobs â€” does my passion for advertising and my creativity mean I am any less capable of doing them? So â€” can you really be anything? Marine biology, here I come. But arts, media, design, advertising, branding, marketing, PR, magazine and literary world â€” look out! Surprisingly delightful (even for adults!), and surprisingly rare. Though there are clips of the movie, I couldn't find the original soundtrack anywhere on YouTube, so, here it is.

Becoming anything we want to be? You Have Specific Gifts! The truth is your gifts are not my gifts. And my gifts are not your gifts. The sight of blood, or even just needles, makes me squeamish. In fact, one time I almost passed out after my husband had a procedure and the doctor was simply talking about the results with me. Sure, I do have the mental and physical capabilities to potentially learn to work a medical job, but I honestly would be terrible at it! And probably miserable, too. That work simply does not play into any of my God-given talents or strengths. I taught high school English for six years. Year after year, concerned students would express their serious worries about their futures. Have you ever felt the way my students did? Because it allows you to focus and pray for God to reveal the path he does have for you, one step at a time. Trust in the LORD with all your heart, and do not lean on your own understanding. In all your ways acknowledge him, and he will make straight your paths Prov. God has a specific plan for your life if you will trust Him and pursue goals according to your gifts—rather than keeping all your options wide open. Put Those Gifts to Work! So where do you start on this journey? Then put those gifts to use! They go wasted if they sit on a shelf. I was also drawn to English and Spanish; they were my favorite subjects in high school. So I decided to go to college and pursue a degree in teaching Spanish. After two years, I knew that Spanish was not the right choice another story for another day! I spent six years teaching in the classroom. I tell you this to assure you that God creates each one of us with specific talents and gifts. When you feel overwhelmed about your future and all your options, pray for God to narrow your choices by helping you focus on the areas you are specifically interested in. Trying to choose from everything in the world will only lead to confusion! But knowing that God wants you to use your gifts for His kingdom will help lead you to accomplish what mission He has for you. Have you ever felt overwhelmed at the variety of choices available? Have you really assessed what you are good at? What are your specific gifts and talents? Let us know below!

I wish I had made that realization twenty years earlier. I wish someone had told me that anything is possible, and by anything, that truly meant anything. Because, the sooner you find what really lights you up in life, the longer and brighter you will be able to burn. There were 60 people in my town, my family contributing seven to those sixty. Eight towns came together to make up our high school. There were 82 people in my graduating class. Of those 82 students, just one was considered a minority. I had a wonderful childhood, albeit a bit sheltered. During my senior year of high school, I met with my guidance counselor to chart my future path. I knew I could also be a nurse as my mother was a nurse , so I added that to the list. At that point in my life, I dreamed of money, my own office and business suits -- so, accountant was the obvious answer. I went to college to be an accountant. For the first 25 years of my professional life I worked in the corporate world. While my focus changed from accounting to human resources, my alignment to a straight and narrow career trajectory was unwavering. After a while I figured I was too senior, too successful and too old to do anything other than follow those who came before me. It was a Friday, and the week had been a torturous one. I was on the phone with my best colleague friend, and we were bitching about everyone and everything. We were making things up. We felt free, energized, excited, creative and strategic. I quit my corporate job one year later and started my Executive Health and Leadership coaching company. I also do Life Coaching. As a year-old, corporate born and bred, Type A perfectionist, learning to be an entrepreneur was a challenge. Twenty years ago, challenge may have felt more exciting than risky. But every day is a learning experience. Every day holds opportunity to make it anything I want it to be. Fundamental qualities like perseverance, hard work and the desire to succeed support your path forward, but where your path leads is open terrain and you are in the drivers seat. The options are endless. You can lead your own movement, start your own company or create your own job title. The trick is to realize that anything is possible, and then go after your anything. Become a leader of your anything. Find what you love, and make something happen. While I say I wish someone had given me this advice earlier in my life, the fact is, I wish I had understood this advice earlier in my life. We are surrounded by motivational stories about people who have, against all odds, done remarkable things. Reality TV allows us to watch as others give everything they have to win money, fame and be declared "the best. And these people are no more special or no more deserving than you are. They simply opened their minds to what is truly possible for them. But more importantly, you need to be the first to believe that you can be anything you want to be. Marriage and Family I have a challenge for us modern parents, especially the American variety: I know we mean well. I know we want the best for our kids. Not every girl is pretty enough to be Ms. America, intelligent enough to go to Harvard, or skilled enough to write a best-seller. Is math not your strong suit? Then give up that dream of starting a dotcom and find a job working for somebody else. There are biological, legal, and intellectual limits of all varieties. Our children cannot be anything they want to be. In fact, the list of things they cannot be is infinitely longer than the list of things they can be. We actually live this truth on a daily basis. So why do we keep repeating these lies? Do Your Best to Be Perfect One reason we perpetuate these false aspirations is in the cultural air we breathe. Limits are for losers. Our modern heroes are rock stars and professional athletes. Selena Gomez, after all, could post a picture of a rock on Instagram and get 98 million likes. Or be like LeBron. Be rich, beautiful, smart, rebellious, nice, witty, tough, artistic, andâ€”this is importantâ€”still down to earth. In other words, kids, not to put too much pressure on you, but do your best to be perfect. We are the center of our own lives, so our children should be at the center of theirs. How can I use these in a life of sacrifice for others? Given my strengths and weaknesses, my personality quirks, my extrovert or introvert nature, how can I best love my neighbor? How can I put myself last and others first? How can I best look out for the needs of others? What career or vocation best enables me to help other people? They are always seeking ways to make life better for others. And they accept their inadequacies with humility. You want your kids to be happy, live a less stressful life, and find fulfillment? Then teach them to be servants. To be honest about their inadequacies. To emulate heroes of self-sacrifice. Tell them to be the best possible servant they can be.

5: No, Kids, You Can't Be Anything You Want to Be â€” CHAD BIRD

"I can be Anything" is a story that was given to my children at the completion of their summer reading lists with our local library. This story tells the typical 'what do you want to be when you grow up?' answers through the eyes of a typical toddler.
