You can take the girl out of the farm I have had a wonderful, relaxing spring break. That list will always be here. I did however spend some quality time with my hubby, enjoy the spring weather, have fun pretending to run a bed and breakfast with my bestie and her fam, burn off my finger tips with hot glue while I made a ton of headbands, and most importantly reconnect with my roots and get centered on my dreams and the future. The quiet country can do that to you, if you let it. Here are some pics of the week Can you spot the tiny church in the back ground? I will be making more of these I have several train cases that I am going to turn into sewing boxes. Everyone needs a sewing box. So pleased with this batch of headbands. All four dogs trying to get on my lap at once. Agro-toursim at its finest. Early morning chore time with the sun barely up. I think I should patten this master piece. We wanted to have a bon fire, but it was too windy, so thanks to the toaster oven we still had smores. New curtains, brightening up the tired old living room. April is Autism awareness month Love my big A babies. I think the reason here is some kind of magical vanilla flavored spray whip cream. Brings back the memories. Oh to have a farm some day Even Meadow wants to be a farm dog. She found some cows milk that was meant for the sheep dog, and went a little wild. Can you see her milk beard? Such a lovely way to start a day.

2: Week 4: mothers, daughters, becoming | MAKING IT HOME

Some people think becoming their mother is a bad thing. Not me, my mom is awesome! It makes me laugh to think about how much I hated gardening and going to garage sells as a kid.

Jan 28, Photograph by Carmen C. Rivera I woke up recently in the middle of the night, sitting straight up on the sofa, one leg folded under me, with my arms crossed and the TV blaring. When I was a teenager, I frequently discovered my mother in the same position after falling asleep while watching TV. My mom whom I refer to as "mother" is beautiful. Lucky for me, my family tells me I look just like her when she was my age. When I was growing up, my mother and I were never really close. And it was true. We were complete opposites. No harm, no foul. My mami is one of the kindest and most generous people I know. She never hesitated to tell me that I was too hot-tempered for her tastes and definitely too loud. Friends tell me that my sharp edges and rough exterior are starting to soften. My quick temper seems a little slower to burst forth. Mother was born in a small town Louisiana, and she was raised with southern charm, southern kindness, and some serious southern twang. She still has a touch of that delightful twang. Even with all her charm and kindness, if she ever gets fed up with something, she has no problem expressing her dislike of the matter no matter what it means to anyone else. I admire all those things about her. I, however, was raised in the heart of Chicago. We lived in a neighborhood that ended up being really rough by the time we were teenagers, and the kids all faced very different challenges growing up. My mother says those challenges made me too loud and too quick-tempered for her taste. My response was always: How was I supposed to prevent it?

September 10, My mother would not let me sing that song in our house, in our car, in the backyard or in the shower. Hit me, baby, one more time. I hate that song. I hate that in the song, Spears, who was 16 at the time it was released, is telling her boyfriend to hit her. I hate the fact that my two daughters now have that phrase in their heads. To hear a 3-year-old or a 6-year-old girl telling a boy -- or anyone for that matter -- to ". And that Spears is a young girl herself makes the song even more repulsive. I love rock music. My mom, who is the head of the department of dance at Cincinnati University in Ohio, loves classical music. I love drums, screaming guitars and gritty voices. She loves violins, violas, cellos and pianos. I hate Britney Spears. She hated Nick Gilder. My mom hated it. If she heard me singing it, she would ground me. The only place I could sing it was at school. Then again, would you want your year-old son singing lyrics about taking this wild and pretty nameless woman home and telling her ". And I add to it. Think about it; her fan base, mostly young girls, try to imitate her. I do, however, let my kids get crazy on occasion.
