The muscular Champion of the world stood in the center of the arena. The others were listening in to the conversation from their seats and Chi Chi leaned forward. The giant leaned back to get out of their way. Not him, anyone but him, Gohan stayed standing as he moved out of the way. He was in the way of his grandpa escaping the stands and Ox King was too big to go around him. The Champ saw his actual opponent descending towards him. Hahaha, stay in the stands old man. Hahahaha," the announcer raised an eyebrow. The announcer dropped his jaw and watched the man land in front of the reigning world champion. Hahaha," Ox King ignored the statement and bowed to the man. When the next kick came around, the huge man dodged back faster than the others thought he could move. The giant raised his arm and swung down hard. The Champ jumped backwards and the fist continued through the floor. Satan but his punches were destructive. Hercule dropped his lower lip to the floor as the Ox man ripped his fist out of the now destroyed floorboards. Down on the ring, Ox King was swinging and missing the dodge-only Champion. After seeing that punch, Hercule was not in the mood to die. The forearm of the giant slammed into the Champ and knocked him off his feet onto the floor. The Champ stumbled to his feet and jump kicked the giant aimed at the face. Hohoho, you are done," he swung Mr. Satan around three times and let go, sending the Champ crashing into the wall. The crowd was silent and then everyone heard coming from a corner of the room, "Yeah dad! In your face," the crowd turned back, still shocked. Satan fell off the wall and landed face first on the ground. Ox King walked away slowly and said back to the announcer as he walked away, "I only accept cash. The others all started cheering for him and even Videl turned back and cheered. Satan was unconscious and drooling as everyone laughed and threw rotten fruit at him. Your review has been posted.

2: Judging Musk-ox

I'm the One Standing Next to the Ox, a delightful tale of modern pioneers, is great reading for all ages. The Church's sesquicentennial re-enactment of the Mormon pioneers' westward march touched the hearts of millions worldwide, motivating many groups to undertake their own pioneer treks.

Being in a New England state allowed me to have exposure to the tradition of working oxen. There are shows and pulls throughout New England which have kept the tradition of driving oxen alive and unchanged in spite of its disappearance from other parts of the country. As I have become more involved in the aspects of equipping and driving a single ox, I began to wonder how other people were utilizing these animals. The following are some of the interesting people I have met, and the inspiring ways they have put their single oxen to work. Paula showed dairy cows in 4â€™H. She had one Holstein cow, which she became very attached to, and she wondered what other things cattle could be used for instead of just meat and milk. She became interested in the uses of cattle for draft work and riding, so she taught her show cow to ride. With time, her cow became old, and her last calf was a bull. Paula decided to keep that bull calf as a riding steer, and she named him Fuzz. Paula said at first her family thought she was crazy, especially when Fuzz reached market age and all the other steers went to beef. After five years, he has become an accepted part of the farm, with his own pen in the free stall and a special diet of dry hay to keep him from gaining too much weight. Fuzz is lost while Paula is away at college, so her cousins spend time with him each day. It is evident that Fuzz is a family project; Paula said her cousins have told her they know when she is home before they have seen her because Fuzz is happier. A farmer is a farmer no matter how many cows they have or the kind of barn that houses them, and Fuzz is a wonderful example of this. The family cares for him and makes special accommodations for his needs. Paula started training Fuzz by teaching him to lead with a rope halter. When he was a calf, she put blankets on him and straddled him to get him used to someone standing over him as well as to having weight on his back. Paula also used clickerâ€™ training methods that are commonly used on dogs. Karen Pryor started clicker training and has written many books on the subject. My understanding of it is that you use a clicker to tell the animal when they are doing something right. After the animal has completed a behavior you like and the clicker is used, then you give the animal a food reward, which causes them to have a positive association with the clicker. So when an animal behaves well, you click and they get a treat. In theory, they will continue to behave well to get another treat. Paula Blough giving rides with Fuzz, her Holstein steer, at a local petting zoo. Paula started using a clicker with Fuzz on the ground as he was taught to lead, so he became comfortable with this method of training. She used alfalfa cubes as treats. At first, she sat on his back, and, as he stood for her, she used the clicker and gave him a treat. She uses two rope halters â€™ one is put on correctly with the lead rope on the left, the other is put on backwards with the lead on the right. The two halters create a hackamore bridle and reins. When Paula taught Fuzz to turn, she clicked and pulled on the right or left rein. As Fuzz turned in that direction she gave him a treat. She has even used him to give rides at a petting zoo. Paula rides Fuzz in their Michigan farmyard. Paula is majoring in agricultural communication and animal science. I asked what would happen to Fuzz in the future as she begins a career. Wherever I live there will be room for Fuzz! I asked Paula what resources she suggests for other people interested in riding cattle or oxen in general, and this is what she recommends: Here they have a small farm of six acres where they keep a flock of sheep, a few goats and several collies. Clair is a dog trainer, and her interest started as a little girl when she began training the family dog to pull things and complete different tasks. Now she trains dogs and their handlers in various types of work including scent training, obedience training, herding and carting. The name of their operation is Golem Kennels. In the midst of this intense doggy world, there is one serene presence that is unfazed by all the business around him. He is Prince Albert of Antioch, a Pineywoods ox. With a small acreage, a broken tractor and round bales to move for the sheep, a single ox seemed like a good investment. Clair called the American Livestock Breeds Conservancy and found information on heritage breeds of cattle and the people that raise them. She found Don Cope breeding Pineywoods cattle in Alabama, so she traveled down there with a friend to look at them. She came home with 4â€™monthâ€™ old Albert in the back of a van. Clair chose a heritage breed, because she wanted an animal that was small, hardy and well suited to the heat of North Carolina. Pineywoods cattle only reach to 1, pounds when they are mature. These cattle are related to Florida Cracker cattle and the Texas Longhorns. The cattle on the farm in Alabama were raised as beef, so Albert had not been handled or had a halter on him. Clair did some halter training before he was brought home, and he loaded well. Albert is very intelligent and trains easily. The Clinton Anderson techniques helped teach Albert to respond to pressure when he is driven with lines. Clair uses a natural horsemanship halter, which is a rope halter with a series of knots on various pressure points; the driving lines connect under the chin. If he does something she likes, she will click that behavior without teaching him a new command. For example, when they were hauling brush to a burning pile, the first hitch was lined up just where Clair wanted it so she clicked it. Every other hitch he brought in that day was lined up in the same way. Once Albert made the connection to what Clair wanted, he continued to do just that. The equipment Clair uses is very simple. Now he has grown into a horse harness with thicker sweat pads and tubular hames. She uses the natural horsemanship halter when she is driving with lines at home and a bridle with a bit for more control when she takes him off the property. Albert hauls round bales on a car hood from the toof the driveway to the sheep pasture. He clears brush on the property, hauls logs, and plows. Clair also uses him to take the dogs for a Sunday drive. One steer needs less area for pasture, and eats less hay. When he first came to live there Clair, pastured him with four goats on a one week cycle. Now Albert is pastured with the entire flock, but he prefers the goats to the sheep. Life is good for the prince of Golem Kennels; he seems very content with his position as master of all he surveys. Clair is happy too! She said anyone looking for information on oxen should look up Premiere Longhorns. For those interested in Clair and her work with dogs, you can find her website at <http://ncdogtraining.com>. Melanie is a nurse, and her husband is the herdsman at Tufts University. Five years ago, they started a team of Brown Swiss oxen named Moose and Squirrel. They live in the heart of oxen country, so they found great mentors in Tim Huppe and Nathan Hines, who helped them get started. One quiet night, Melanie unyoked her team and sat on a stump to watch them eat a round bale in the pasture. She watched them for a while just enjoying their contentment. Then she brushed them before saying goodnight. She rushed to the pasture and found Squirrel laying on the electric fence unable to rise. They shut off the fence and called the vet. But Squirrel was dead before the vet arrived. He had an intussusception or a telescoped bowel , and there was nothing anyone could do. After the shock and the grief wore off, Melanie evaluated her situation. What could she do with Moose? She was confronted with the choices of working him or selling him. Melanie spoke with Tim Huppe about the possibility of finding another teammate for Moose. Tim told her of the difficulties of finding another steer of the right size, and at the same level of training. Tim suggested that Melanie work Moose as a single ox. Tim is also the owner of Berrybrook Ox Supply, so he was able to get her the equipment she needed to start her single ox venture. The equipment she uses consists of a single yoke and a britchen that attaches to the yoke. When attached to a load, the traces keep tension on the yoke â€” keeping it in place. She still uses the original yoke from Tim Huppe on occasion, but, for heavy loads, Melanie uses a yoke by Nathan Hines. Yoke makers are like any craftsman; their work carries distinctive traits. This helps lower the angle of draft to get the most amount of power to draw a load. Melanie said Moose was really down after losing his teammate. Five weeks later, when they purchased a new pair of calves, Moose perked up. Since then, Moose has taken to life as a single ox, without looking back. Melanie and Scott also keep goats, so if they take the team to a show and leave Moose at home, he still has a companion.

The Chinese Zodiac, which has twelve animals for its signs, repeats itself every twelve lunar years. These signs are the rat, ox, tiger, rabbit, dragon, snake, horse, goat, monkey, rooster, dog and pig. The ancient system runs from year to year, rather than month to month as the western zodiac. Origin The origin of the Chinese Zodiac is related to the ancient ritual of worshiping animals. The more complete records of the zodiac can be found as early as in the pre-Qin period. In modern times, the zodiac sign is used as mascots for the Lunar New Year, becoming a symbol for entertainment and cultural activities. Each animal is assigned a set of characteristics said to represent those born under it. Of the twelve animals, each is considered to be particularly compatible with two others, forming four groups of three, each with similar ways of thinking, temperaments and characteristics. Although the Rat is considered to be timid and even cowardly, it is also highly intelligent. The Monkey is cunning rather than clever or brave, while the Dragon is courageous. Together these three make a formidable team. They are steadfast and determined, the type who keeps a goal in mind and persists until it is attained. The Ox has physical and mental stamina, though may be a little dull and unimaginative, while the snake has guile and diplomacy on his side. The Rooster is the leader of this trio, more outgoing and sure of himself than the other two. They are self-determined and sometimes come across as selfish or shallow. The Tiger is highly excitable, passionate and fierce, whereas the Horse is less fierce though still headstrong and independent. The Dog, while loving his freedom also has a sense of loyalty and honesty often lacking in the other members of this group. They are lovers not fighters, who believe in cooperation and harmony, to the extent of being considered boring, unintelligent and cowardly at times by the others. They are sensitive souls. While the rabbit has a crafty cunning and a certain detachment, the Goat is the symbol for civility and humble servitude, and the Pig is known as the most generous, sincere and honorable of all the animals in the zodiac. The following table shows the compatibility among different Zodiacs. Chinese Zodiac Compatibility Chart

The Origin of the Chinese Zodiac Many years ago, there existed no calendars, and people had to find a way to keep track of time. For this reason, they felt that the only choice they had was to go to the temple and pray to the Jade Emperor the ruler of Heaven. Jade Emperor heard the plea of the people and so he decided to come up with a way that people will be able to measure time. After some serious thought, he finally came up with a good idea. Since humans and animals are such good friends, it would be best if we use the animals to represent each year on the calendar. This will be helpful to the humans and easy to remember. The first twelve animals to reach the bank will be declared the winners and each of them will represent a year of the zodiac. During that time the rat and the cat used to be good friends, the same as brothers, they did everything together. As they talk about the race, the wise and dangerous rat thought: I will never be able to cross the river. They both hopped onto the warm back of the ox as he began crossing the river. While they were crossing the river the rat was thinking to himself: I want to be the first animal in the zodiac, I have to be! Because the cat was distracted by looking at the clouds, the rat took that as an opportunity to push the cat into the water. Therefore the cat has never represented the Chinese Zodiac. The ox was unaware of what had happened on his back. The rat witnesses how the cat was struggling to swim in the water, and said: As soon as the ox was close to arrive at the bank, the rat jumped on his head and leaped to the bank to complete the race first. As a result, the rat was declared the first winner of this race. And the ox the second. Soon after the worn out tiger arrived at the river bank, he was very positive that he has been the winner of the race, however the Jade Emperor said: Sad to say, although the rabbit was hopping in full speed, his lip got damaged by branches from the tree, so even now, it still seems like his mouth is separated in the middle. Dragon came fifth in the race. Next, the snake appeared from the bushes, and took the sixth place. Since he was running too quickly, he lost his feet in the course of the race, so up until today, snakes have no feet, they crawl on the ground. The horse came seventh in the race. Soon after goat, monkey and rooster arrived at the bank, which goat was declared the eighth winner. He met monkey and rooster along the riverside. They seen a rafting log, therefore they all hopped on the log. The naughty dog came swimming up slowly, it seemed as though he was taking a bath. Soon after the pig came, crossing the river slowly. Understand the 12 Chinese Zodiac.

4: An Early Morning Sushi Run - The Hungry Ox

The Church's sesquicentennial re-enactment of the Mormon pioneers' westward march touched the hearts of millions worldwide, motivating many groups to undertake their own pioneer treks.

Sure, the market opens at 6am and you can pick up some good pre-packaged eats. Lucky for me, inside the facility was a nice sushi bar. And better yet, it opened at 9am. But hey, their menu had plenty to choose from. Standing at the counter, and being part of the early bird crowd only 2 others, I got to see the magic happen. With about 3 wait staff that morning, you can guess that there was no problem getting attention. After the meal, I took a stroll around the sushi bar area. I was so tempted. If I lived here, I would definitely swing by for lunch or dinner. Everything looks so much better than the grocery store sushi we get in the states. The food looked well crafted. It was good to come by in the morning. It gets quite packed during the day and nearly impossible to get into the standing sushi bar. Good thing there are those counters just outside the market. Buy one of these to go containers and have your meal there. Standing Sushi Bar 2F, No. I love this place and I think you will to. But guess what, in the middle row I did have some. Overall though, this was more than just 10 pieces of nigiri. Did they get my order wrong? Am I going to send it back if they did? Just look at that seared toro. Posted September 21, by the hungry ox.
