Three of my novels, The Quincunx, The Unburied and my latest, Rustication, happen wholly or partly over Christmas and show the darker – even menacing – side of family and friendship. They are all set in the 19th century and evoke the fiction of that period. The treatment of class and sex is far more realistic than anything that either of those writers would have dared. The girl is naive and trusting and only gradually does the reader start to work out who the doctor is, and what is really going on. It brings a fresh psychoanalytical perspective to a text which has inspired many post-Freudian narratives in literature and film. The author constructs a complex narrative that keeps the reader guessing right to the end with some ingenious surprises along the way. The interplay between the political complexities of the time and the interests of the protagonist is gripping. A biography is about to be published that will destroy his reputation and Walter sets out to clear the name of his hero. As well as telling an engaging story, the author displays a sure-footed knowledge of the period. Not just the language but also the portrayal of the manners, the conventions, and the class-based nature of society all ring true. When Bessy starts work as a young maidservant in Scotland in her young mistress, Arabella, instructs her to keep a journal each day and let her read it. That is what the novel is and the exuberance and naivety of the girl charm the reader, who only gradually realises that Bessy is not wholly to be trusted. And Arabella has her own secrets as well. Why has she required Bessy to reveal her thoughts in writing? Soon each of them is spying on and deceiving the other in a relationship which becomes – apparently without their realising it – more than a little erotic. And the reader is in for a switchback ride of surprises and revelations – some of them pretty dark. The young girl, Florence, tells a story which becomes increasingly incredible in more than one sense. Her language and assumptions are disturbingly unlike those of most twelve-year-olds. In a sort of confession, the killer describes his gradual involvement in the shadowy world of perjury and betrayal organised by the Dublin police. I found it hard to decide if the novel was a study in the corruption of a fairly ordinary man in extreme circumstances or an account of the evolution of a psychopath. Either way, the horrible logic of the plot leads to an entirely plausible though surprising twist. This is a masterpiece and could only work as a novel. A book that will resonate in the memory. The embittered central character, Edward Glyver, starts by murdering a randomly chosen stranger just to prove that he can do it. He even less sympathetic after that. This is a clever novel but a very cold one. This time she speaks for herself and, plunged into her dislocated and disorienting world, readers have to decide for themselves what is the truth.

Lapolosa Wilderness is such a place. There are no lights, or power lines, or telephone poles, or noise pollution to spoil the peace or dim the Milky Way in the nighttime sky. Lapolosa is true wilderness. The climate at Lapolosa is ideal, close enough to the equator to be warm year-round, yet it lies at an elevation that is cooler in the summer, still comfortable in winter and malaria free. Doing so is still a good idea. Giraffe, kudu, red hartebeest, black wildebeest, zebra, impala and other wildlife roam its plains and forests. But because Lapolosa is not yet a Big 5 reserve, visitors enjoy hiking and camping on the property in safety. Lapolosa is blessed with water, lots of water. It possesses many small, year-round springs, streams and waterfalls, several boreholes and extensive frontage on the Buffelskloof Dam and two rivers. A favorite hike for visitors is to one of the magnificent waterfalls just below Buffelskloof Dam, including one thirty-meters high. Most roads are 4x4 or quad trails. Patrols are done by quad bike. Access to Lapolosa is through a manned entrance gate. The main road through the reserve is private gazetted over 10 years ago. No workers live on the reserve. All have homes elsewhere, and depart the reserve on their leaves. There are no servitude rights to anywhere on the property. A 70 hectare section on the south side of Buffelskloof Dam and the Waterval River, with water rights; is also part of the reserve. Solar provides electrical power in the reserve and water is heated by instant gas geysers or wood-fired donkeys. Telephone and internet is available by cell signal over much of the reserve. Come, volunteer at Lapolosa. See for yourself what a magical place it is.
