The Imperfect Panacea I have been critical of blogs. So here I am creating one. The limits of my hypocrisy seem endless. While concept of blogs are noble, most that I have read are a waste of bandwidth, with opposing views vomiting their dogma, trying to earn some kind of intellectual points in a meaningless game. I am the Blog God of my universe. So this blog will be my little contribution to the development or decline of humanity. A good friend of the family suffered a significant stroke about three weeks ago, leaving her disabled without feeling in the left side of her body. She cannot use her left arm and can barely lift her right foot a half inch. This tragedy occurred to a very athletically talented woman, who played golf times a week, ran numerous social clubs, and worked once a year coordinating player housing for a local pro golf tournament. While at my local country club, a group of people who all know her were discussing her situation. One of her better friends, says, "Thank god, she is receiving some of the best care in the nation, from Dr. You fucking got to be kidding me. Thank god, for good medical care. How about Fuck You god for disabling a beautiful woman in her prime of life, causing untold hardship on her husband and children. This is one of my biggest issues with "Christians. How can you pray to an omnipotent being and thank him for fucking up your life? He all powerful, why does he need to fuck up anything? I have come to the conclusion that Christians are worst than sheep. They are sheep who are blind, ignorant and irresponsible. You are blind in that you refuse to see the hypocrisy of it all. I apologize to the retards. Most mentally disabled people I know, have more awareness than most Christians I know. You point out God works in mysterious ways. Bill Mahre pointed out, Microwave ovens are pretty mysterious; they invisibly warm your food. Most people do not really understand how they work. I am sorry I think more of myself than that. Here is a novel idea for Christians Get off your ass, take some personal responsibility and take action. If there is a god behind all the social ills in the world, what a fucked up being it must be.

Clearly, many of those learnings need not be produced, nor are they normally acquired, in a school. More importantly, any attempt to "reform" schools to try to produce them might likely not be cost efficient. In addition, one should note that many items are points of contention, especially the preferred values. Where consensus is lacking, sloganeering and obfuscation will be engaged in to keep organizational activity flowing. When something happens not too long after a button is pressed, people are inclined to see it as cause-and-effect. Roughly put, "cause" indicates control through correlation. The would-be intervener looks for a correlation that can be controlled, that provides the ability to produce, stultify or prevent something. But with control, comes moral responsibility. Many schools have mission statements claiming such an effect on their students, e. All school reform is based on the relatively simple model: It serves primarily promotional purposes by disregarding alternative influences affecting school change other than the intervention being promoted. Its point is to sell a product: Also disregarded are alternative effects, -- "spin-offs" -- hidden costs and benefits --, other than the promised change in school characteristics. Complex Causation and Moral Responsibility The basic practical rules for causation and moral responsibility are these: The Alternative Cause Rule: Figure 2 gives some examples of alternative causes, with possible correlations indicated. Alternative causes not only may reduce intervener responsibility; but, they draw attention away from the proposed intervention and may reduce its cogency. That is why entrepreneurial educational interventionists find it most convenient to avoid consideration of alternatives to their proposals. The Alternative Effect Spin-off Rule: Spin-offs may create undesired intervener responsibilities by creating collateral costs or benefits. Yet such things as governance, teacher skill levels required for hiring, school size and funding are, for public schools, not within the control of teachers, principals, superintendents, or supervisors. Such school characteristics are not controlled by school staff. Though they may impact student occupational fitness, they are not the moral responsibility of school staff. The narrow-focus simple model given in figure 1 helps obscure the fact that educational systems of every type are embedded in, a component of, EI. The simplistic thinking that we encounter in almost every aspect of the analysis of school productivity is a crucial support for creating and maintaining markets for that industry. A Fuller but Simplified Model Figure 4 What figure 4 shows is that a change in a school characteristic may be the effect of both a reform intervention and parental influence. The intervention may increase the school characteristic which increases taxes as it increases occupational fitness. Parental influence may support or, if strong enough, supplant the proposed intervention. But occupational fitness remains vulnerable to the effects of recession, since this is a variable independent of the intervention and parent influence. Who is responsible for such spin-offs, especially if they are unintended or unforeseen? This becomes particularly cogent when the spin-offs are undesirable. In the law, lack of intention or foresight is often a mitigating factor when damage occurs. In any case, the basic rule holds:
