Form and content of application Required information 2 The application shall, unless otherwise provided by these Regulations, contain the name, birth date, address, nationality and immigration status of the applicant and of all family members of the applicant, whether accompanying or not, and a statement whether the applicant or any of the family members is the spouse, common-law partner or conjugal partner of another person; b indicate whether they are applying for a visa, permit or authorization; c indicate the class prescribed by these Regulations for which the application is made; c. However, the Federal Court has also shown some resistance to the idea that the Government of Canada can simply bounce incomplete applications for minor mistakes. In Campana v. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration Canada concluded that it took legislation to reject the application. I believe paragraphs 11 and 12 describe adequately the state of the law: Secondly, although the Minister may issue guidelines and other non-binding instruments as a matter of administrative practice, even if such a policy existed in , it acted as much more than a mere guideline in this instance: Friends of the Oldman River Society v. The Minister of Environment Canada. It is no answer for the Minister to state that nothing in the Act or Regulations prohibit him from making it. His authority must be found in explicit and positive language in a relevant statute or regulation. Here, the Immigration Act Fees Regulations are not even ambiguous on the issue; they are entirely silent on whether applications may be returned for overpayments. For the foregoing reasons, I have concluded that the Visa Officer should have applied the C. Relying on operational manuals or practices that have developed over time cannot be a substitute for the appropriate authority of law. Unless the respondent can point to legislation to support its practice, and it has relied exclusively on section 10 of the Regulations, it will have failed. As in Xiao, silence cannot be used to argue that nothing prohibits returning an application for it to be resubmitted. On the issue of what the Regulations provide for, the Court stated that: If there were an ambiguity in the language used, I would be less reluctant to rely more firmly on the Regulatory Impact Assessment Statement. In this case, I cannot find anything in section 10 to confirm that a lack of compliance results in an application not being in existence. Rather, we have a section that provides in clear terms what an application under the Regulations must contain. That an incomplete application may not be processed is one thing. Suggesting that it does not even exist is quite another. Justice Roy went on to order that the matter was being returned for a re-determination by a different officer on the basis that an application was in fact made. These are Ma v. The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration Canada. An application under IRPA must be a complete application. The receipt of an application which is missing key components is not an application within the meaning of IRPA and the Regulations. This interpretation ensures that officers spend their time reviewing completed files, allowing for a more effective use of resources. Importantly, applicants are not preserving their place or priority in a queue based on the filing of partial applications, to the detriment of those applicants who file later, but file complete files. Section 10 of the Regulations sets out the minimum requirements for applications. Section u of the Regulations provides that an individual may continue to work in Canada beyond the expiry of their work permit if they applied to extend their work permit prior to its expiry, until IRCC makes a decision on their extension application. If an incomplete application is not an application, then presumably they never had implied status, meaning that their work was unauthorized. In Stanabady, Justice Harrington also found that an incomplete application was not an application because since it was incomplete it would be impossible for an officer to either approve or refuse it. There, the Federal Court of Appeal answered the following question: The Federal Court of Appeal answered that an incomplete application which was returned did not lock in, stating that: I agree with the Judge that an incomplete application is not an application within the meaning of IRPA and the Regulations. In my view, an incomplete application can no longer exist because the text of section 12 provides that the entirety of an application that has failed to meet the requirements under section 10 is returned to the applicant. There was no authority to do otherwise. Therefore, as the appellant did not comply with the requirements of the Express Entry scheme, the respondent reasonably refused to consider his application. The choice of wording strongly suggests that an incomplete application was in fact an application until it was determined to be incomplete. This would provide positive certainty to the issue which has not yet been raised by the courts, which is whether someone who submitted an incomplete application ever benefited from implied status.
