Although Mauritius, once part of the British Commonwealth, is very well known, its close neighbour, Reunion Island, a French overseas island, remains relatively unknown to us Brits. Let me explain why. Reunion Island ; expect the unexpected Reunion is home to three cirques, Cilaos , Salazie and Mafate, otherwise known as collapsed calderas, or collapsed volcanoes to you and me. One of our first activities on the island was to explore Cirque Salazie and visit some of the local villages located in the mountains. Reaching heights of over 1000m at its peak, the cirques have a sub-tropical climate and endure frequent rainfall. This, alongside the mountainous peaks of varying heights adds to the overall landscape of the area, whose gushing waterfalls and low-lying cloud create a mystical and dramatic setting. Clouds can hamper the magnificent views available, so venture up the cirques early in the day to beat any settling afternoon cloud. France disguised as a tropical island The island is wholly French. A large part of the population speak French, but Reunion Creole is its native language – just to confuse matters. The bustling market was full of fresh tropical fruit and vegetables , local handmade craft and masses of fresh vanilla. Having said this, the locals are all incredibly warm and friendly and give the market a wonderful atmosphere. As well as having three collapsed volcanos and the dormant Piton des Neiges, Reunion Island is also home to an active volcano, Piton de la Fournaise, aptly translated as Peak of the Furnace. The volcano is one of the main attractions of the island and has a popular hiking route to the top of the caldera for those that dare. Alternatively, take to the sky and explore the volcano and Reunion Island on a helicopter tour like we did. This is one of the best ways to truly appreciate the elegance and diversity of the island. Reunion Island is also host to a range of other exciting activities including abseiling, canyoning, hiking, cycling, surfing, snorkelling, parasailing, canoeing, and much more. Marvellous Mauritius Although I had never been to Mauritius before this trip or the Indian Ocean come to think of it , unlike my experience with Reunion Island, I had an image in my mind of what to expect. Think shallow crystal clear waters gently lapping the white sands surrounded by palm trees. The reality was exactly that, but a thousand times better as I was seeing it with my own eyes. Grab a snorkelling mask and a pair of flippers at the first available opportunity and take to the waters. Mauritius is home to a spectacle of exotic fishes that live off the coral reef. Being able to swim alongside the underwater wildlife and catch a glimpse of their world is an unforgettable experience. If you caught the adventure bug from Reunion Island and are looking to keep things active, Mauritius is also home to the longest zip-line course in the world. Made out of seven lines ranging from 100 to 1500 metres long, this is a fantastic, and slightly different, way to see the magnificent Mauritian landscape. After beating some initial vertigo nerves, the whole group conquered the course as we soared over the tree tops spotting several very large Mauritius Fruit Bats along the way. Authentically beautiful If you have never visited this region before, then nothing can truly prepare you for the beauty of an Indian Ocean island. This exceptional journey is a must for anyone seeking an authentic island experience. I just wish I had more time to spend there. 4: Yacht Charter in the Indian Ocean

A yacht charter in the Indian Ocean will give you the occasion to discover the gigantic lagoon of Seychelles and Amirantes, the marvelous sailing of Nosy Be, Malaysia Langkawi, Thailand Phuket and the crystal-clear waters moorings in the Mauritius and Maldives.

Sailing the Indian Ocean: It tends to be more of a hot-spot for people living in Asia, Africa or Australia, for the obvious reason that it is much closer. Shame really, as most of the sailing in this region is much more adventurous than the Mediterranean or the Caribbean. The crossings can be long and grueling, and during the southern hemisphere winter, the Roaring Forties latitude pumps out serious ocean swell that can cause hectic conditions. Read our guides to sailing in Thailand and the Perhentian Islands for more info Other shorter sailing trips in the Indian Ocean are the more local excursions that travel between remote island cays. For example, there is a developed sailing market in the Maldives that transports surfers between various reef passes. Check out our guide to Maldives sailing holidays for more info. This type of sailing demands proper maps and equipment due to very diverse depths. Here are some of the epic places for sailing the Indian Ocean: The Seychelles This nation is formed from an archipelago of small islands. Similar to Mauritius, this island chain gained its independence from Britain. This area is truly stunning. The water is crystal clear, the beaches have white sand and the land is undulating and exciting. Mauritius Though the most common language amongst the locals is French, Mauritius gained its independence from Britain. Each year in September, the KSP kitesurf world wave tour comes here for an exciting competition. Western Australia The largest city of this region is Perth. With a population of around one million people, Perth is the most isolated city of this size in the entire world. Known for being a very clean and artsy place, Perth is a great spot to spend some time during your next sailing trip. Indonesia This island chain nation is most known around the world for Bali and its surfing. Rumor has it that some of the waves are more crowded here than even California. Every year, a staggering amount of surfers make their way take on the perfect waves that are found all throughout Indonesia. The cost of living is low in the non-touristy areas.
