Print shares Are intermarried couples that had a rabbi officiate at their weddings more likely to be engaged with Jewish life than intermarried couples that were married by a minister or justice of the peace? Yes, as demonstrated by a widely cited study by my colleagues at Brandeis University. No, it does not. I believe that data can and should inform Jewish communal policy, and I was intimately involved in data analysis for the study in question. For these reasons and more, I want Conservative rabbis and others to understand exactly what the study demonstrates “and what it does not. In recent months, a passionate and pivotal debate over rabbinic officiation at inter marriages has unfolded within the Conservative movement. Some well-intentioned advocates of officiation have cited the study on which I worked to claim that rabbinic officiation leads intermarried couples to greater engagement with Jewish life. Not surprisingly, the intermarried Jews who had a rabbi officiate surpassed other intermarried Jews on a dozen measures of Jewish behavior, ranging from talking to friends and family about Judaism to attending Jewish religious services. That said, the old adage that correlation does not imply causation applies here. Intermarried Jews who chose a rabbi to officiate had much richer Jewish childhood and adolescent experiences than other intermarried Jews. More of the group who chose a rabbi received formal Jewish education and celebrated Jewish holidays at home while growing up. The logical conclusion is that their stronger pre-existing Jewish commitments led them both to seek a rabbi to officiate at their weddings and to engage in Jewish life after their weddings. As the study reports, after controlling statistically for pre-existing differences in Jewish childhood and adolescent experiences, the gaps between intermarried Jews who had a rabbi officiate vs. The study did not collect much information about Jewish experiences in the formative years between high school graduation and marriage, and it could not adequately control for them. With better data, we could test whether the remaining behavior gaps between intermarried Jews who had a rabbi officiate vs. The claim that officiating rabbis subsequently guide intermarried couples into the Jewish community is further undermined by the near lack of contact between the couples and their officiating rabbis after the weddings. In a survey of 52 of these same intermarried Jews who had a rabbi officiate, only five said they had more than passing contact with their officiating rabbi after their wedding. Half had no contact at all. The study also demonstrates that even with rabbinic officiation, markers of strong Jewish commitment are absent among most intermarried Jews. Absent such an experiment, the key question that should be addressed by systematic research is this: Would permitting Conservative rabbis to officiate at inter marriages undermine the strong preference for in marriage that still persists among alumni of Conservative day schools, summer camps and USY United Synagogue Youth? In considering the question of officiation at inter marriages, Conservative rabbis need to ask themselves whether the evidence for any positive impact on intermarried couples is sufficient to outweigh any potential negative impact on the rest of the Jews they have been entrusted to lead.

For example, black men were almost three times as likely to marry someone of another race as black women. Asian women were twice as likely to marry outside their race as were Asian men. There was no difference between genders for Hispanics and whites. The biggest differences are between different races and ethnicities. The percentage of blacks who marry nonblacks has more than tripled, to 17 percent. Asians and Hispanics have the highest rates of intermarriage, with more than one-quarter of all Asian newlyweds marrying a non-Asians. Sociologists and demographers attribute that to four decades of immigration that increased the pool of Hispanics and Asians who are potential mates. Christian Oh, who teaches Asian culture at the State Department, never imagined while growing up that he would marry another Asian. He came to the United States from South Korea when he was 2, in the early s, so his father could work for his doctorate at the University of Iowa. The family ended up in Roanoke, Va. He dated girls who were white, black and Hispanic, and went to his prom with an exchange student from India. Only when he attended college at George Mason University did he start dating other Asians. He met his wife, Sarah, when she returned a pair of jeans at a Gap where he was working. A new immigrant, she only spoke Korean. The couple wed in Non-Hispanic whites make up nearly two-thirds of the population, so because of sheer numbers, the bulk of intermarriages have a white spouse. As intermarriage rates have grown, attitudes have changed substantially. In a Roper Poll, two-thirds of the people surveyed said they could never imagine themselves marrying someone from a different race. In a Pew poll, just 6 percent of whites and 3 percent of blacks said they would not accept an interracial marriage in their own family. Dan Lichter, a Cornell University sociologist who has studied intermarriage, said the trend shows the continuing blurring of racial boundaries.
