Instead, they surveyed randomly chosen households and asked the occupants about their experiences. From that approach, they concluded that between Sept. The researchers calculate a statistical term called a 95 percent confidence interval, which encompasses a broad range " from to 8, deaths. Their figure of 4, lies near the middle of that range, and they round up to something over 5, to account for some assumptions they made. The research team randomly selected 3, households in Puerto Rico. Local scientists surveyed them over the course of three weeks in January. People in those homes reported a total of 38 deaths. The researchers then subtracted deaths recorded during that same period in and concluded that the mortality rate in Puerto Rico had jumped 62 percent in the three months following the storm. The study notes that 83 percent of the households in Puerto Rico were without electrical power for the time period looked at, more than days, from the date of the hurricane until the end of Puerto Rico residents and outside observers have long argued that the official death toll is hopelessly inadequate. It captures the number of deaths the medical examiner attributed directly to the storm " the high water and howling winds in the worst natural disaster on record for the U. Maria came ashore as a Category 4 hurricane, with winds gusting at over mph and drenching rainfall. CNN surveyed funeral homes after the storm and tallied hurricane-related deaths. The New York Times compared official death records from September and October and identified more than 1, excess deaths, compared with the average for and Alexis Santos, a researcher at Penn State University, and a colleague, used death certificates to come up with a similar estimate. Results of that study have been delayed and are due out this summer. Chan School of Public Health, says, "Our approach is complementary to that and it provides a different kind of estimate and a different kind of insight into the impact of the hurricane. The household survey is a widely accepted technique for estimating casualties following a disaster. In the latter, the result would underestimate the true toll. In fact, the Harvard team says its results are "likely to be an underestimate" because of this bias. The survey looked at deaths through the end of , but the scientists suspect that the excess deaths continued into this year. Hospitals and doctors struggled to provide care, and many people simply had trouble getting to the doctor or the hospital to seek medical care. The survey finds that one-third of the total deaths in the months following the storm were caused by delayed or interrupted health care. Understanding the true number is important for many reasons. Although the hacienda is not directly linked to the early grants of indigenous American labor, the encomienda, many Spanish holders of encomiendas did acquire land or develop enterprises where they had access to that forced labor. Even though the private landed estates that constituted most haciendas did not have a direct tie to the encomienda, they are nonetheless linked. Encomenderos were in a position to retain their prominence economically via the hacienda. Since the encomienda was a grant from the crown, holders were dependent on the crown for its continuation. As the crown moved to eliminate the encomienda with its labor supply, Spaniards consolidated private landholdings and recruited free labor on a permanent or casual basis. The long term trend then was the creation of the hacienda as secure private property, which survived the colonial period and into the 20th century. Estates were integrated into a market-based economy aimed at the Hispanic sector and cultivated crops such as sugar, wheat, fruits and vegetables and produced animal products such as meat, wool, leather, and tallow. Haciendas originated in Spanish land grants, made to many conquistadors and crown officials, but many ordinary Spaniards could also petition for land grants from the crown. It gave him a tract of land that included all of the present state of Morelos. Most owners of large and profitable haciendas preferred to live in Spanish cities, often near the hacienda, but in Mexico, the richest owners lived in Mexico City, visiting their haciendas at intervals. Administrators were often hired for a fixed term of employment, receiving a salary and at times some share of the profits of the estate. Some administrators also acquired landholdings themselves in the area of the estate they were managing. In central Mexico near indigenous communities and growing crops to supply urban markets, there was often a small, permanent workforce resident on the hacienda. Labor could be recruited from nearby indigenous communities on an as-needed basis, such as planting and harvest time. In some places small scale cultivators or campesinos worked small holdings belonging to the hacendado, and owed a portion of their crops to him. In a number of places, the economy of the 18th century was largely a barter system, [citation needed] with little specie circulated on the hacienda. Stock raising was central to ranching haciendas, the largest of which were in areas without dense indigenous populations, such as northern Mexico, but as indigenous populations declined in central areas, more land became available for grazing. Sheep in particular had a devastating impact on the environment due to overgrazing. This reconstruction has revealed the nature and operation of the hacienda system in Mexico, its labor force, its systems of land tenure and its relationship to larger Hispanic society in Mexico. The Catholic Church and orders, especially the Jesuits, acquired vast hacienda holdings or preferentially loaned money to the hacendados. In the history of Mexico and other Latin American countries, the masses developed some hostility to the church; at times of gaining independence or during certain political movements, the people confiscated the church haciendas or restricted them. Haciendas in the Caribbean were developed primarily as sugar plantations, dependent on the labor of African slaves imported to the region. In Argentina and elsewhere, a second, international, money-based economy developed independently of the haciendas, which sank into rural poverty. In most of Latin America the old holdings remained. In Mexico the haciendas were abolished by law in during the revolution, but remnants of the system affect Mexico today. In rural areas, the wealthiest people typically affect the style of the old hacendados even though their wealth these days derives from more capitalistic enterprises. He established an extensive program of land distribution as part of the Agrarian Reform. Likewise, Peru had haciendas until the Agrarian Reform of Juan Velasco Alvarado, who expropriated the land from the hacendados and redistributed it to the peasants. Philippines [edit] In the Philippines, the hacienda system and lifestyles were influenced by the Spanish colonization that occurred via Mexico for more than years. Attempts to break up the hacienda system in the Philippines through land reform laws during the second half of the s have not been successful. There were protests related to the Hacienda Luisita. An example of these was the Hacienda Buena Vista, which dealt primarily with the cultivation, packaging, and exportation of coffee. The sugar-based haciendas changed into centrales azucaras. This marked
