Finally, check check check! Lindsay and Izzy brought this one to life. Many times I found myself literally laughing outloud and that is a first in these books. That girl is craaaaaazy, but in the best possible way. It reminded me of reading Jane in BDB. Because I could tell that YOU were wondering. So you called me in here, boss, because you want me to play the part of Dr. Evil, the terrorist master-mind, right? Lindsey keeps Jenk on his toes and they are so sweet. The humor and the banter in the beginning kept a smile on my face the whole time. I enjoyed every moment. OMG, he was incredible! Definitely my favorite character so far. He was so funny! Even when he was being a pighead sexist I was cracking up. The situation was obvious to anyone with eyes. Decker- the lucky bastard -had, at some point in the past, thrown Sophia a bang. She, the way most women did, had wanted a Re-Lay-Tion-Ship, Decker-roonie had activated his super-Y chromosome, exfiltrated pronto, and now, whenever they did an eyeball to eyeball, awkwardness ensued. Hence the meltdown Izzy had just witnessed. That right there had me wiping laugh tears off my cheeks. He seriously found a way to simplify things in the Izzy way. Especially because you know that underneath that flippant guy is someone really vulnerable. The rich family is Horace and Prudence Peckerfart and their son Dick. No relation to Gillman - or is there? Say this for us, Daniel:

2: Into the Storm : Suzanne Brockmann :

Into the Storm: In which Suzanne Brockmann has finally managed to work her way through pretty much all of Seal Team Sixteen and suddenly realizes that maybe she needs a new schtick to hang her hat (and her series) on, and thus we move from terrorists foreign and domestic to serial killers, which don't require such a Naval response.

It was ajar, so she pushed it open, peeking in. His company, Troubleshooters Incorporated, did a great deal of business with the government, including the military. Which meant lots of uniforms walked through their door. The very young man—“Jeez, were they really taking them this fresh out of diapers these days? And oh, yes, he was definitely first-class—in more ways than one. Extra cute, with muscles. Shame on her for making assumptions. When she went to see an R-rated film. Lindsey knew firsthand what a pain in the butt it was to look far younger than her years. Pretty, pretty hazel eyes. And not too tall, either. She liked him already. Of course, most men seemed to turn into idiots around women who looked like Tracy, the brainless hairdo. Alyssa had to be good and used to that. She could not believe that any pair of shoes, even those made by mermaids off the coast of Sicily, could be worth three hundred dollars. They were friends back in high school was guy code for Jenk had always wanted to jump her bones. He no doubt thought helping her get a job might work. Tom Paoletti was the best boss Lindsey had ever had. Not only was he good-looking in that Captain-Picard-make-it-so, bald-men-can-be-sexy way, but he was also smart and unbelievably kind. Lindsey made a mental note to offer to volunteer to fire Tracy for him. Except, Tracy was not a multi-tasker, and his distracting presence would be far less convenient for everyone else in the office. She, for one, was extremely tired of answering the phones because Tracy had managed to screw up the voice mail system again. Combined with those hazel eyes, rimmed by thick, dark lashes. He was beyond cute, but it was probably in a way that he himself hated. His mouth tightened slightly, because he misunderstood her comment. That was going to be some kind of fun. I had you at more like thirty, if you want to know the truth. Without makeup, I look about twelve. Because I could tell that you were wondering. So you called me in here, boss, because you want me to play the part of Dr. Evil, the terrorist mastermind, right? How realistic is it for the hostage to weigh only ninety-two pounds? Six and a half feet tall? She knew when to stop pushing, so instead she sighed heavily. Was it possible she was going to be more than the hostage? Suddenly this was back to maybe being fun. She was going to get to be the secretary, as well as the hostage, helping out with scheduling. She would have complained that she never saw Tom assigning Sam Starrett to help out with the scheduling—“except for the fact that Sam was bitching about Tom giving him a similar task just last week. Meeting in advance, at a bar? Or it was supposed to be. Lindsey looked at her boss. For your old team. At least a year already. That must be frustrating. Who did Tom think he was kidding? Starting right here and now. She laughed, covering it quickly with a cough. He rubbed his forehead. This is going to be. Both for Commander Koehl and for me. I want you working together. Mark Jenkins wanted her phone number. He was cute and funny and smart—and tremendously flawed. He had, after all, the hots for the Hair-Do. Perfectly, cleanly out of reach, unless, of course he got a little drunk and ended up going home with Lindsey as his solid second choice. Oh, yeah, if she played her cards right, she could get totally skewered by this one. Still, a little distance would probably be prudent. She wrote her number on the back. Yeah, she had been right about him favoring one side. Her own shoulder—“her right one—“twinged in sympathy. But you can absolutely let Tracy help. In fact, you can use this opportunity to get to know her, help bring her up to speed. Tom was an excellent leader. He was capable of reading his subordinates even when, like Lindsey was doing right now, they were wearing their best poker faces.
