Buy from another retailer: Mostly, I used him to hold down the bow of my canoe, instead of the bags of lead shot I usually employed for that purpose. He was smarter than the lead shot but not so much you would notice. The boy was about sixteen that year, the year I used him for lead shot. Whenever he ran out of money, which was often, he would come over to my cabin on the river and work for me. Mostly, I would have him dig holes in the ground. When you own a cabin on a river, you always have need for lots of holes in the ground. I prefer to err on the side of not enough, because it is wrong to spoil youngsters by paying them too much. Whenever he complained about the pay, I would tell him about my first job. I was fourteen and worked for a farmer all one summer digging holes in the ground. The farmer was so cruel and sadistic that he had probably once been a commandant in charge of a slave labor camp. But I was the only one who suspected his previous employment. Everyone else thought he was a fair and decent and good-hearted man. About once a week I would get mad and resign my position. Then the farmer would come and tell my mother what a fine worker I was and that he wanted me back to dig more holes. He told her that my work habits had improved greatly under his supervision, and now my pace was such that he could often detect movement with the naked eye. So Mom would make me go back to digging holes. The farmer gave me a bonus to make up the difference! Furthermore, I became the only person he would let hunt deer on his property, because I had been such a good and loyal worker and also because there were no deer there. Sometimes, when the fishing was good, I would go out in the canoe almost every morning. I would get up very early and rush down to the river still buttoning my shirt, but the boy would be there already, waiting. We would paddle off to fish the channels that flowed between the islands where the river merged with the lake. As we paddled along we would exchange our theories about the purpose of human life. My theory was that the purpose of life was to perfect ourselves through learning and discipline in order to fulfill our cosmic responsibilities as part of the self-consciousness of the universe. He thought the purpose of human life was for him to buy a car. At the beginning of summer, the boy knew nothing about fishing, but by July he knew everything and had begun to advise me. And switch to a black gnat. He enjoyed teasing me, because now he almost always caught more fish than I did. I would chuckle good-naturedly, swack the water just so with the paddle, and soak him to the skin. The boy had a talent for getting on my nerves. I could remember how peaceful it had once been, when I was a solitary paddler, slipping quietly along the channels between the islands, doing everything just right, becoming one with nature and the mosquitoes and deerflies. Or the following week. It was a relief. I was glad to be rid of him. Having nothing else to do, I asked around about him the next time I was in town. Most folks had no idea who he was, but the lady who runs the grocery said she thought he lived out on such-and-such road. Still having nothing else to do, I drove out the road and found an ancient mobile home approaching terminal depreciation, under some scraggly pines. No one was home. A man stood watching me over a nearby fence. A boy works a whole lot better than bags of lead shot for holding down the bow of a canoe, no question about it. About a week later, another boy showed up at my cabin, apparently having heard I was short a boy. He was a redheaded kid with glasses that kept slipping down his freckled nose. He managed to stifle any hint of elation.

In this book, the outdoorsman extraordinaire is doing what he does best--telling fish stories, getting into scrapes with buddies, occasionally waxing philosophical, but grousing just as often. Sometimes he even ventures out of the wilderness and into mainstream humor. McManus is easily the equal of Dave Barry or any other contemporary humorist, for that matter: When I think of all the times a Stupidity Alarm could have saved me from committing a Stupidity Please, please, please, please! The cowboy who sold me the horse said it loved children. But as I belatedly discovered, it hated adults. He covers well-worn territory, sure. And when he tells stories about his boyhood, a note of wistfulness and pathos creeps in that is definitely agreeable. Product Description Patrick McManus offers wry observations about small-town life and curmudgeonly insists on bigger and bigger fish stories in this hilarious collection from one of the greatest contemporary humorists. With his cast of characters - true "characters" everyone; McManus creates a series of delightfully hilarious vignettes! Crazy Eddie Muldoon, Mr. Peabody, Miss Deets, Henry P. From the first time I read one of his stories in Field and Stream I was hooked. This book has some new stories, some reruns, and a few new ones that left me laughing on the floor. I wish they would edit more carefully. There were many pagination errors, spelling errors, etc. His writing in graphic but very, very, very funny!!! You can almost picture the antics he writes about. Good clean humorous writing. Super fun to read over and over By Leona Vanleeuwen on Aug 07, Even as a female, I have been around similar people he writes about and some of the camping experiences are familiar. His writing style makes you think along one line and he surprises you with a twist of meaning or application--I love it. I really like that any bad language his characters use is not written out but uses dashes etc. I have most of his books.
