Important publications now number in the hundreds, even when limited as this article is only to works by cultural anthropologists and not forensic anthropologists, which directly reference human rights and not works that are relevant but make no more than a passing mention of human rights. Whether current scholarship in anthropology focuses on human rights as practice or as discourse, its common signature is to foreground the local, national, and international political and economic processes in which human rights and larger social justice projects are embedded. Two publications that appeared in marked a watershed in the development of new modes of anthropological engagement with human rights. One, the contributory volume edited by Richard Wilson, Human Rights, Culture and Context Wilson, cited under General Overviews, anticipated research and writing relating to both the practice and discourse of human rights. Anthropology has been torn between analytic and critical dispositions toward human rights and divided about what substantive matters matter most, even as convergence around theory and method has been discernible since the late s. Therefore, no single overview may capture the diversity of the subfield, even as a reading of several overviews can be of benefit to both newcomer and specialist. Merry has the comprehensive scope proper to a review article but focuses fairly narrowly on anthropological contributions to the study of international law. *Toward a critical anthropology of human rights. Locating rights, envisioning law between the global and the local. In The practice of human rights: Tracking law between the global and the local. Cambridge, UK, and New York: With some overlap in themes with Goodale, this introduction defines four themes in anthropological studies of the practice of human rights: An anthropology of human rights. Anthropology and international law. Annual Review of Anthropology Anthropology, human rights, and social transformation. Edited by Mark Goodale, Wilson, Richard Ashby, ed. Human rights, culture and context: The social life of human rights. The anthropology of human rights and transnational law.
