As an early education teacher, one of the most common questions I get from parents when they see their kids voluntarily cleaning up the classroom or sharing happily with other kids is: How do you do that? To raise loving, happy, well-adjusted kids without nagging, screaming, stress and drama, click here to get popular 6-part mini-course How to Be a Positive Parent for FREE. When a child receives consistent response from a caring adult, trust, deep attachment and a sense of being wanted develops. The key is to ensure that these relationships are respectful, responsive and reciprocal. For instance, as children arrive into my classroom, I always make sure to greet them at the door; just as they greet me. Not so I can begin my day with peace and quiet, but so I can wake her gently. First I turn on the light and call out her name and announce it is time to start thinking about getting up. I know in my house there would definitely be a fight. It avoids comparisons and competition. The most effective of all techniques though is to catch children being good or in an act of kindness. The reward and acknowledgement will be more genuine than if your child runs up to you and exclaims he cleaned his room or shared his cookie with his baby sister. When an older child tied the shoes of a younger child in my class I was all over it; I told him what he did was caring and kind. Then I drew attention to the facial expression of the girl he helped; she was smiling. Effective discipline is about modeling the right behavior. In addition to offering positive reinforcement, modeling appropriate behavior is equally important. Modeling provides visual clues to what acceptable behavior is and indirectly reinforces the appropriate way to act. Consider for example what happens in your car. The second scenario demonstrates proper problem solving skills by remaining calm and not endangering others on the road despite being angry. Effective discipline is about providing the right guidance. When you guide your kids, always be direct. Give reasons and explanations for rules keep it simple for young children. It will help to drive the notion home if you retell a story of when your child was running and got hurt. I even speak to my teenager in a similar way. Last weekend you were late because you overslept. Sometimes 15 minutes pass and I need to jog his memory again. But he hardly ever gives me a hard time. Why would I tell my baby to stay off the stairs a million times a day when I can install a safety gate? Or make extra work for myself lifting children to the sink every time they need to wash their hands, whereas placing a stool at the sink will allow them to access the soap, water and paper towels themselves. Prevention not only is a great form of discipline but also supports self-help skills and builds self-esteem. The same can be done on computers and mobile devices. Here are a few more tips to embrace the prevention attitude: Give children as much notice as possible when changing activities, leaving the house and a change in the schedule. Try setting a timer or pointing to where the minute hand on the clock will be at clean-up time. I will never forget my first experience with a child who had a behavioral disorder. He spent rest time at a table usually working on jigsaw puzzles he was a puzzle machine! However, rest time is also used to give staff breaks and when teachers do most of their planning. This child would constantly interrupt me while talking with parents or other staff. He begged and pleaded for my undivided attention and company. It began to disturb the rest of the other children and he would call to them to leave their cots and come play with him. This was hard for me because rest time is my favorite time to get in one-on-one interactions. Then when I returned provided he had been behaving while I was gone I would spend about minutes with him working on a puzzle or playing a quiet game of Uno. The difference however is huge. Instead of sitting students down at an empty table alone feeling bad about himself I created several spaces in my classroom where child could go to or be brought to when feelings become so overwhelming they interfere with the problem solving process. These areas were private, cozy spaces in the nooks and crannies of my classroom that included soft, over-sized pillows, a class photo album, a small selection of books and quiet objects such as sensory or calming jars , Magana-doodle-esque boards and boxes sorted by themes of quiet, calming activities like magna-tiles or puppets. Same as a time-out, a time-in should only last one minute per year of life unless the child chooses to stay longer. When the time is up I ask the child if he knows why he had to be separated from the group, then I help him think of better ways he could have solved the problem instead. Negative reinforcement, such as spanking or time-out only seem to work at first because of shock value and over time it becomes less effective. As parents, it can be a lot more difficult. Give yourself a lot of grace. Get support; allow your partner, family and friends to pitch in and always remember to take time out to recharge your batteries. Receive others just like it once per week directly in your mailbox. How does this impact the way you approach a troubling situation? Do your kids see you as a loving guide or a dictator? How does this impact your relationship with them? How does this affect their motivation to comply with the house rules? The Ongoing Action Plan for Fine Parents Try a few of these over the course of the next week â€” Create a predictable schedule so your child knows what to expect; like nap time after lunch. Recognize problems as learning opportunities and give children freedom to solve problems on their own. Give your child the chance to make choices. One or two is enough and make sure you can live with whatever your child chooses. An example of this would be asking your child if he wants a peanut butter sandwich or pizza for lunch and not trying to talking him into the peanut butter sandwich when he chooses pizza. Be honest about your feelings and show how to express them appropriately. Save no for emergency and serious situations.

4: Inviting Positive Classroom Discipline - Outside the Box Learning Resources

Inviting Positive Classroom Discipline. Purkey, William Watson; Strahan, David B. Invitational theory addresses the total educational environment and culture of the classroom and school, focusing on the people, places, policies, programs, and processes that constitute any school culture.

The Physical Environment Is Invitational In a well-disciplined classroom, the room itself is appealing. Many of us teach in cramped and overcrowded rooms without enough basic materials and certainly not expensive equipment such as interactive whiteboards and LCD projectors. Despite these restrictions, effective secondary teachers can manage to create an environment where students focus on learning. We can arrange desks to encourage collaboration as well as independent work, minimize traffic-flow problems, and make sure materials are readily available. The walls can be used to stimulate student engagement with displays of student work. Students Understand the Rules and Procedures They Are Expected to Follow The teacher has obviously given much thought to planning and establishing a well-organized learning climate. Class rules, procedures, and notices of upcoming activities are posted in convenient places to help students stay on track. Encouraging mottoes remind students of their goals and responsibilities. Students follow class routines for daily chores without nagging. In a well-disciplined class, students understand what they are expected to achieve each day and how they are to go about it. Active learning generates a much higher noise level than the silent classrooms of the past. Students are up and out of their seats while engaged in a variety of interesting activities that encourage thought and discovery. They do more talking than the teacher does on most days. A well-disciplined class is a place where no student sleeps or sits idly waiting for dismissal. This is evident in such nonverbal interactions as body language and tone of voice as well as in what students and teachers say to each other. Students speak with confidence because they feel their opinions are valued. Students in a well-disciplined class also respect their classmates. There is a general sense of togetherness and steadfast courtesy. Students Take Responsibility for Their Learning In a well-disciplined class, students may be led by their teachers, but they are not coerced into good behavior through threats of dire punishment. Instead, they are encouraged to understand the importance of choosing good behavior and its lasting rewards over the short-term thrills of bad behavior. In an orderly class self-directed students not only encourage each other, but they also work with their teacher to achieve academic and behavioral goals that they themselves have helped establish. Successful teachers employ a variety of strategies to promote responsible decision-making and create self-reliant students.
