Non-Arabic speakers often make these mistakes: Arabic names may be written "Abdul something ", but "Abdul" means "servant of the" and is not, by itself, a name. If he introduces himself as "Abdul Rahman" which means "the servant of the Merciful" , one does not say "Mr. Rahman" as "Rahman" is not a family name but part of his [theophoric] personal name ; instead it would be Mr. To add to the confusion, some immigrants to Western countries have adopted Uddin as a surname, although it is grammatically incorrect in Arabic outside the context of the associated "first name". Even Indian Muslims commit the same error. Abdul "servant of the" which would sound quite odd to a native speaker of Arabic. But Europeans , Iranians , and Indians may not pronounce some Arabic sounds as a native Arabic speaker would, and thus tend to pronounce them identically. Taking bin or ibn for a middle name: As stated above, these words indicate the order of the family chain. For example, Sami Ben Ahmed would be mistakenly addressed as Mr. To correctly address the person, one should use Mr. Sami Ahmed or Mr. As between all languages, there are differences between Arabic grammar and the grammar of other languages. Arabic forms noun compounds in the opposite order from Indo-Iranian languages, for example. During the war in Afghanistan in , a BBC team found in Kabul an internally displaced person whose name they stated as "Allah Muhammad". However, by the rules of Iranian languages and most languages of India , this name does mean "Muhammad who belongs to Allah", being the equivalent of the Arabic "Muhammadullah". Most Afghans speak Iranian languages. An example is explained below. Assume a man is called Saleh ibn Tariq ibn Khalid al-Fulan. Saleh is his personal name, and the one that his family and friends would call him by. However, not all Arab countries use the name in its full length, but conventionally use two- and three-word names, and sometimes four-word names in official or legal matters. Arabic names and their biblical equivalent[edit] The Arabic names listed below are used in the Arab world, as well as some other Muslim regions, with correspondent Hebrew, English, Syriac and Greek equivalents in many cases.
