Like other countries, Israel is a work in progress. Blemishes abound and Israelis are the first to criticize and question their own shortcomings: The problems are longstanding and a searing indictment of Israeli leadership. But show me another country on the planet that, within such a relatively short time and against such daunting odds, has done what Israel has achieved since its inception in On short notice, its search and rescue unit has operated in many countries including Mexico, Kenya, India, Turkey and the U. At physical risk, the IDF has rescued more than 2, people including many fighters who are sworn enemies of Israel on its northeastern border and transferred them to Israeli hospitals. Traffic is halted as children take over the streets on their bicycles. There are no winners or losers, just two people trying to sustain a rally. The interactive clip, which allows viewers to switch through 16 channels on a virtual TV, is the work of a Tel Aviv start-up called Interlude. It has engaged in wildly lopsided deals, exchanging up to 1, Palestinian security prisoners many mass murderers for a few soldiers and to retrieve the bodies of others. He was the first Arab to chair the Central Elections Committee. A collective spirit reigns, like in few other places. The device, called Mobile Eye, is being built into many new cars around the world. Everyone talks about it and bus drivers play the radio for all to hear, including the hourly newscasts. Likewise on Memorial Day, Israelis, stand for two minutes in honor of fallen soldiers as sirens wail. Usually with good intentions and a helpful spirit, they have a penchant for offering unsolicited advice on how you can do something better. Known as tahina or tahini, the country produces it in two-dozen flavors and more than 50 flavors of the tahini-based treat called halva, selling it around the world. And the world should be thankful it does. Robert Sarnier is a communication specialist in Toronto. He worked as a journalist for many years in Israel and France.

Our debt-to-GDP ratio is steadily falling, unemployment is lower than the OECD average and more and more Israelis are entering the workforce every day. Some officials recommended declaring a moratorium, but finance minister Eliezer Kaplan and his director-general David Horowitz who later became the first governor of the Bank of Israel convinced prime minister David Ben-Gurion not to do so. Instead, a new economic policy was established in the form of Israel Bonds, advanced reparations talks were conducted with West Germany, government spending was no longer covered by the uncontrolled printing of cash, and a balanced budget was implemented, mainly by raising taxes and bringing about the depreciation of the shekel. In its early years, the Israeli economy was characterized by an extremely high level of government intervention. Of course, it was absolutely crucial for the government to invest heavily and for the long term in such a young country. And of course, if a country wants to prosper and develop, it must take risks, but only calculated risks, after it has carried out lengthy examinations of all the relevant issues. In the early years of the state, Israel absorbed hundreds of thousands of new immigrants, and spent enormous amounts of money to build roads and factories, with an emphasis on labor-intensive industries, such as the Ashdod Port, the National Water Carrier and Dead Sea Works. In order to survive, the Jewish people were forced to develop a unique ability to adapt quickly to changes without forgoing our traditions. We succeeded in adapting ourselves to our new surroundings, while at the same time striving to change our environment. These unique qualities have been passed down in our DNA. This desire and ability to create innovations, which has been transferred to us from our forefathers, is one of the reasons why the Israeli economy has been so successful over the past few decades. We have been imbued with the ability to succeed and our government has enabled Israeli businesses and banks to develop in a competitive environment that is relatively free of government intervention. And most of our failures have been ventures in which the government showed excessive intervention. Some of these failures, however, led to positive results since the challenges were interesting and exciting and the people involved learned so much along the way. They were then able to apply this knowledge to other endeavors that in the end were successful. The Israeli economy is quite small, and so in order for Israeli businesses to succeed they must strive to penetrate global markets. They do so by relying on their Israeli DNA and our high-quality workforce. Israel has already proven its ability to take advantage of our accumulated knowledge by developing some of the leading technologies in the world in the fields of irrigation, solar energy, desert farming, pharmaceuticals and medical technology. Israel expects to continue to excel in these and other fields in the coming decades. The most profitable sector in the Israeli economy is the one that is the least regulated: In my opinion, a significant factor in the incredible success the Israeli high-tech sector is that it has enjoyed relative freedom from government regulation compared with other industries. This freedom has allowed the high-tech industry to break through barriers more easily. That is not to say that Israel has not shown great innovation, talent and dedication in more traditional sectors, too. We must not make the mistaken assumption that increasing intervention will lead to greater competition and efficiency. I believe that if we follow this direction, we will succeed in spurring economic growth, which has slowed in recent years. Granted, the current rate of growth of the Israeli economy is still greater than in most developed countries, and yet our potential is still much higher. Translated by Hannah Hochner.
