From critically acclaimed military historian Eric Hammel comes a vivid oral history account of the Tet siege of the Khe Sanh Combat Base. The words of American fighting men caught up in the grueling, deadly seventy-seven-day ordeal create a harrowing tapestry of tragedy and triumph.

In the coming days, a campaign headquarters was established around Sap Lit. According to the official NVA history, by December the North Vietnamese had in place, or within supporting distance: This range overmatch was used by the North Vietnamese to avoid counter-battery fire. After failing to respond to a challenge, they were fired upon and five were killed outright while the sixth, although wounded, escaped. This marked the first time that all three battalions of the 26th Marine Regiment had operated together in combat since the invasion of Iwo Jima during the Second World War. The Marines, however, were prepared. The North Vietnamese infantry, though bracketed by artillery fire, still managed to penetrate the perimeter of the defenses and were only driven back after severe close-quarters combat. Hundreds of mortar rounds and mm rockets slammed into the base, leveling most of the above-ground structures. One of the first enemy shells set off an explosion in the main ammunition dump. Many of the artillery and mortar rounds stored in the dump were thrown into the air and detonated on impact within the base. Soon after, another shell hit a cache of tear gas, which saturated the entire area. The village, 3 km south of the base, was defended by local troops, plus 15 American advisers and heavy artillery provided from the base. At dawn of 21 January, it was attacked by a roughly strong NVA battalion. Reinforcements were dispatched aboard nine UH-1 helicopters, but were wiped out after landing near the NVA, along with one helicopter. A small ground-rescue force from the nearby combat base was repulsed, while the survivors from the village assault evacuated themselves to the combat base. The NVA fought throughout the day, into the next night, and finally completed the capture of Khe Sanh village at The battalion was assaulted on the night of 23 January by three NVA battalions supported by seven tanks. The Battle of Ban Houei Sane, not the attack three weeks later at Lang Vei, marked the first time that the North Vietnamese had committed an armored unit to battle. Several rounds also landed on Hill Five days later, the final reinforcements arrived in the form of the 37th ARVN Ranger Battalion, which was deployed more for political than tactical reasons. On the afternoon of 29 January, however, the 3rd Marine Division notified Khe Sanh that the truce had been cancelled. The Tet Offensive was about to begin. Declassified documents show that in response, Westmoreland considered using nuclear weapons. Toward a Bombing Halt, Journalist Richard Ehrlich writes that according to the report, "in late January, General Westmoreland had warned that if the situation near the DMZ and at Khe Sanh worsened drastically, nuclear or chemical weapons might have to be used. Johnson on 19 February, was declassified in It reveals that the nuclear option was discounted because of terrain considerations that were unique to South Vietnam, which would have reduced the effectiveness of tactical nuclear weapons. Operation Niagara Further information on the electronic sensor system: An airborne battlefield command and control center aboard a C aircraft, directed incoming strike aircraft to forward air control FAC spotter planes, which, in turn directed them to targets either located by themselves or radioed in by ground units. Naval aircrews, many of whom were redirected from Operation Rolling Thunder strikes against North Vietnam, flew 5, sorties and dropped 7, tons of ordnance in the area.
