Happy New Year from The Lean Marketer. by Rebecca Herson - on September 23, - Category Just for Fun. Wishing all of our clients, colleagues and friends who celebrate, a very happy and healthy New Year!

The excellent, the amusing, and the off-beat. Last night I went as usual to my friends to have dinner, but today it struck me how much the celebration of New Year has changed in the relatively short time since I came to Taiwan. The New Year is not celebrated with the intensity and traditions it once had even a few years ago. One reason might be the banning of firecrackers as too dangerous. Now all is still, except for a rare pop here and there from someone intent on keeping the old traditions, or with a few leftover firecrackers. Also, for at least a week all shops were closed and the streets were virtually empty. Many of my friends used to go to some other part of Taiwan for a week or two to visit family, but now they only go for a few days, if they leave at all. By Monday since this is a weekend I am sure that everything will be back to usual. There used to be a dozen or two to choose from, some of which were mentioned in the post on the tin house bank. My selection of New Year Animals has to be somewhat skimpy this year, owing to a paucity no pun intended of real dogs in Chinese antiques, at least the ones I have collected. As has been touched on in the past, foo dogs or fu dogs are not dogs at all, but are actually lions. I have once or twice tried to look this up, but the etymology of the phrase seems lost in time. This small black and white ceramic dog, a charming little fellow, is however an unequivocal example. The black stripes might look more at home on a zebra, but since there is no Zebra Year, I have no hesitation in letting him be the mascot for Dog Year. Looking at it, it seems as though it might have been influenced by some of the Staffordshire ceramics from England, although a quick internet check failed to find any close parallels. One problem with small Chinese animals is that they are often not identifiable with any degree of certainty. Take a look at this small pendant wooden case, with brass hardware, intended to be worn at the waist and perhaps for tobacco or snuff. The small animal splayed on the lid seems like it could be a dog, but this is far from certain. Let me know in the comments whether you think this is a dog or some other animal—fox?? I know that I should go after that dust with a toothbrush, but my policy with cleaning or fixing antiques is to go slowly. I imagine that in the future I will spiff this up a bit. I deliberately withheld this wooden vinaigrette with a dog finial from the vinaigrette post, although it was visible in the group photo, because I knew that Dog Year was coming up. Almost always, an animal on top of the vinaigrette is a lion, of which many examples were shown in the earlier article. In fact, I think that this is the only animal-topped example I have seen that does not feature a lion. Sporting a dragon on each side, it could well have been made to celebrate some earlier Dog Year, or as a gift for someone who was a Dog, that is, born in a Dog Year. At any rate, the dog is boldly modeled, and I love the way his tongue sticks out! Remember, this is only about 2 inches tall. The narrow side features a coin and a connected-dot pattern; perhaps this is supposed to depict a dog constellation. There are seasonal stores in Taiwan that at this time sell New Year decorations and merchandise. Unlike my antiques, almost anything dog-related is available, done up in the traditional red and gold. I bought a red plush dog wearing traditional brocade clothing and hat, for the same child who got the chicken last year. As in the West, in Chinese cultures dogs are valued for their friendliness, loyalty, and responsibility. These would all be welcome traits to come to the forefront in the coming year. I wish everyone a joyful, healthy and prosperous Year of the Dog. All photos and original objects property of the author.

That was the sowing date favored by culinary expert, author, and English professor Angelo Pellegrini, who considered May 15 the last frost date of the season in the Seattle area. For four decades before his death, Pellegrini had single-handedly propagated the heirloom beans -- now commonly known as Pellegrini beans -- in the garden of his Seattle home. In the mid-twentieth century, a handful of the beans traveled across the ocean from Italy to California and into the hands of vintner Robert Mondavi, a gift from his uncle in Italy. In the s, Mondavi gave a few of the beans to Angelo Pellegrini to plant in his 1, square-foot garden in Seattle. A popular teacher at the University of Washington for many years, Pellegrini immigrated from Italy at age 10 and grew up in rural Grays Harbor County before embarking on a distinguished academic career -- and winning even more renown for his garden, his cooking, his wine cellar, and ultimately his influential writing about food and culture. For more than 40 years, Pellegrini cultivated, propagated, and enjoyed these little beans, and his careful attention enabled them to become perfectly adapted to the growing conditions of the Pacific Northwest. As Pellegrini neared the end of his life, his son Brent helped keep up the family garden. Being able to trace a "family lineage" is the very definition of an heirloom vegetable -- an old-time variety saved and handed down through multiple generations of families. It can be eaten either fresh or dried. When dried, its small, round bi-colored orbs have a creamy, earthy taste. In , Herbfarm head gardener Bill Vingelen planted bean starts around two beanpole "teepees. He told The Seattle Times, "Our yield was fairly heavy A few beans were given to the other gardeners at The Herbfarm for safekeeping, just in case. Three years later, the harvest had expanded sufficiently that in Vingelen was able to plant 32 teepees to support about 1, plants. Restaurant owner Ron Zimmerman recalled: It was from onward that we were able to feature this incredible bean on our menus [with] some frequency" Zimmerman email. A Culinary Icon and a Unique Bean A culinary icon in the Northwest, Angelo Pellegrini was famous for his bountiful home garden filled with all types of vegetables, herbs, and berries. His garden was so lush that Sunset magazine sent a photographer to visually record it, season by season, over the course of a year. Pellegrini grew, harvested and regrew the beans for over 40 years, the bean has become adapted to the Seattle-area climate. Years ago, to test the genetics of the Pellegrini bean, Northwest food pioneer and sustainable-agriculture promoter Mark Musick sent a sample of the beans to the Organic Seed Alliance for analysis. The lab reported back that there was nothing to compare them to. The beans embodied their own distinct heritage. He insisted that no special talent or competence was needed to produce a successful kitchen garden, and he encouraged his readers to roll up their sleeves, pick up a hoe or shovel, and dig in! He loved home-grown produce for not only its taste and esthetic quality but also its economic value. In , Pellegrini made the following financial assessment of a crop of beans: The current price of fine-quality green beans is eighty a cents a pound. A pound of shelled shell beans is about a dollar and quarter. Thus the value of the beans grown on one hundred and twenty square feet of the garden area is sixty-five dollars Need I proceed further in this tedious, miserly reckoning of dollars and cents? Have I not provided beyond all doubt that a kitchen garden is a creative assault on scarcity? He savored them slowly, bean by bean, mashing each one with his fork and swiping it through a dab of olive oil before popping it into his mouth. Although the designation of May 15 as the last-frost date in the region may have been true a half-century ago, it is no longer the case, according to Zimmerman: May 15th-ish is still a good rule of thumb if one is planting seeds directly in the soil direct sowing. One can plant them up until the summer solstice and still reap a crop of fully matured beans in the autumn" Zimmerman email. Cuisine and Culture Pellegrini wrote elegantly about the connection between food and culture, giving voice to concepts that were years ahead of their time for the average mid-century American family. In The Unprejudiced Palate, regarded today as a culinary classic, he said: The quality of the fare, the manner in which it is prepared, the time devoted to its ingestion, the conventions of the dinner table: Musick agreed that there is an intrinsic link between what we eat and where we come from: It connects us back to Angelo Pellegrini, who connects us to Robert Mondavi, who connects us back to villages in Italy. All of that is embodied in those seeds" Leson. This essay made possible by:
