John Lemprière (c. , Jersey - 1 February , London) was an English classical scholar, lexicographer, theologian, teacher and headmaster. He was the son of Charles Lemprière (died), of Mont au Prêtre, Jersey.

There is, for example, the quest plot which is an intellectual mystery in the manner of Umberto Eco; there is the Dickensian style and world of many of the middle sections of the novel; there are the interrelationships between classical myth and modern life; there is a pirate chase; and, finally, there is a love story. That quest involves a search into the history of the East India Company and into the bowels of its mysterious and expansive archive. Norfolk intertwines this and other plot strands with a good deal of success, in a mixture of styles that are, on the whole, rather overwrought. Furthermore, there is often no clear demarcation between one plot strand and another, as the narrative quickly shifts from one to another, straining point of view and structure. The overall effect is like that of reading Charles Dickens with a lens provided by Thomas Pynchon. Norfolk emphasizes his prodigious classical learning and his love for Juliette, the apparent daughter of Lord Casterleigh, a part owner of the East India Company. These recurrences make him doubt his sanity. Later it is revealed that this was another plot by the East India Company. In addition to these Dickensian events, John discovers a document that suggests that he is the owner of one-ninth of the fabled East India Company. Septimus appears to be a friend and guide to John but, like many others, he is in the pay of the East India Company. Despite this apparent betrayal, Septimus does help John in a number of ways, and he is the one who will reveal the true parentage of Juliette Casterleigh at the end of the novel. While searching for more evidence to support his claim, John discovers a worthwhile activity, writing a dictionary of classical mythology. John labors on his dictionary as Samuel Johnson labored on his, and readers follow him through the alphabet, mastering entry after entry. During this scholarly work, John finds out more about the East India Company. The company originally had a charter from the English monarch, but early reverses forced it to seek financial help from a group of French traders from the city of La Rochelle. John consults Lady de Vere about the history of the company and his right to a part of the profits. Currently, the company is ruled by a cabala of nine men who are plotting to aid the revolution that is coming in France. Most members of the group have their origins in La Rochelle, on the east coast of France. They were Huguenots and were caught in the persecution and siege of the The entire section is 1, words.
