Leopoldo Lugones was the leading Argentine practitioner of "Modernismo"--the Latin version of Symbolism. This volume collects several of his best fantastic short stories and is a must for students of the international Symbolist Movement.

He was raised in the Church of England, and with his younger brother Percy, sang in the choir of St. Leopold was named after his grandfather Leopold Stokowski who had emigrated to England from Poland in the 1840s or early 1850s. In addition to learning choral music, he played the organ and violin. He was admitted to the Royal College of Music in January at the age of 16. His skill as an organist developed rapidly and on 25 June at the age of 16 he was elected to membership in the Royal College of Organists. Stokowski was engaged to be organist and choir director at St. His part-time study was arranged by Sir Hubert Parry, the director of the Royal College of Music and a full professor of music at Oxford. Stokowski received his Bachelor of Music degree on 19 November. In 1862 he was offered the job of organist and choir master at St. At this church, whose members included J. Morgan, Stokowski transcribed a number of orchestral works to be played on the organ. Stokowski, still young and unknown, inaugurated a series of organ recitals at St. Stokowski was ambitious to conduct and resigned his position at St. Stokowski spent his summers in Europe and made his debut as an orchestra conductor in Paris on 12 May. He had spent the previous fall and spring writing to Mrs. Charles Taft as well as Bettie Holmes. Stokowski arrived in Cincinnati on 29 May. On May 17 his selection as conductor of the Cincinnati Orchestra was announced in the press. His first season with the Cincinnati Orchestra was a great success with audiences and critics. In 1863 Stokowski met Rachmaninoff who was on his first visit to the United States. Rachmaninoff played his Second Piano Concerto with Stokowski and the Cincinnati Orchestra on January 21 and began an association that would continue to develop in Philadelphia. After announcing their engagement on 8 April, Stokowski and Olga Samaroff were married quietly on 24 April. They continued to pursue their individual careers and spent time in Europe in the summers, particularly in Munich. Stokowski resigned his position with the Cincinnati Orchestra in 1865, citing differences with the board of Directors. When conductor Carl Pohlig left the Philadelphia Orchestra in 1865, Stokowski was free to accept an offer to conduct the Philadelphia Orchestra beginning in the fall of 1865. The nine performances in Philadelphia and one in New York at the Metropolitan Opera were sold out to wildly enthusiastic crowds. Stokowski studied acoustics and sound recording technology. Harvey Fletcher of Bell Laboratories, he helped develop a binaural recording scheme. He was interested in the architectural design and acoustics of orchestra halls and was eager to contribute to plans to build a new hall for the Philadelphia Orchestra in the 1860s to be called the "Temple of Music. Bok and awarded to the individual who rendered the most valuable service to the city of Philadelphia in the preceding year. In May of 1866 papers spread the news that Stokowski and Olga Samaroff were separating and had signed an agreement to share equal custody of their daughter Sonya born the previous year. Their divorce was granted in June of 1866. They had two children, daughters Luba, born 2 January 1867, and Sadjia, born 26 October 1868. Designed to attract young people from ages thirteen to twenty-five with low ticket prices, the concerts were enormously popular, and hundreds of people were regularly turned away at the doors. A Youth Concert Committee was formed to help run the concerts and publicize them, the young people chose the music on the program, and a representative of this committee attended meetings of the Orchestra Board of Directors. From this beginning a Youth Movement was started, including a Youth Orchestra conducted by Sylvan Levin, a Youth Chorus conducted by Harl Macdonald, and informal groups meeting to play or study music. A drama group was formed as well, and in a magazine titled Youth was published documenting the activities of these various groups, all of whom saw Leopold Stokowski as their inspiration and prime mover. Some members of these early groups followed Stokowski throughout his career. Natalie and Faye both worked as his personal assistants on and off through the years, particularly after Natalie Bender accompanied Stokowski to England when he moved there in 1869. She and his assistant Jack Baumgarten took care of his household and assisted with his affairs until the time of his death. One writer has estimated that Stokowski premiered some 2,000 new or unplayed works in his long career Smith , Many were the first performance of works of European composers in the United States; many were world premiers. In he corresponded with Philadelphia contralto Marian Anderson and her manager Billy King about the possibility of a performance by Anderson with the Philadelphia Orchestra. He was also interested in seeing copies of the African-American music in her repertoire. Marian Anderson Papers, Ms. Stokowski retained the studio and apartment he had rented since from the Philadelphia Art Alliance at Rittenhouse Street, but moved to Hollywood. During the summer of filming began on the motion picture Men and a Girl, in which Stokowski starred with Deanna Durbin. In December of Evangeline Johnson filed suit for divorce from Stokowski, desiring a more stable home life for their daughters. Much of the music was recorded with the Philadelphia Orchestra at the Academy of Music in Philadelphia in April and the film opened in In as the war approached, Stokowski organized a concert to benefit the Hollywood Committee for Polish Relief. Throughout his career Stokowski showed a strong interest in young musicians, both women and men, auditioned thousands of them, and encouraged them in their careers. In he founded the All-American Youth Orchestra and toured Latin America with these young musicians during that summer. In the Youth Orchestra toured fifty-four U. They had two sons, Stanislaus, born 22 August and Christopher, born 31 January This marriage too ended in divorce after 10 years. People who knew Stokowski at this time, including his biographer Oliver Daniel and secretary Wendy Hanson, spoke of his strong attachment to his sons, his need to be involved in their lives, and his desire for their well being during a difficult divorce and custody suit. In , Stokowski took the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra on a nationwide tour of Great Britain at the invitation of Sir Thomas Beecham, establishing a pattern of guest conducting there which would continue for more than twenty years. At the urging of his manager, Andrew Schulhof, Stokowski accepted the position of conductor of the Houston Symphony Orchestra in and continued in that position until The idea of building another orchestra appealed to Stokowski and he hoped to be able to raise his sons in Texas. As he had with earlier orchestras he refined the sound, premiered contemporary works and recorded extensively with EMI and Everest. Stokowski toured the Soviet Union in and played ten concerts with three Soviet Orchestras. Eugene Ormandy invited Stokowski to return to Philadelphia in January to guest conduct the Philadelphia Orchestra. A few days before the end of December, Stokowski fell and broke his hip while playing with his boys. Again, as he had done with the All-American Youth Orchestra, Stokowski auditioned and hired young musicians, many of them women and minorities, to play with a few seasoned hands. Stokowski conducted this orchestra without pay and made some of its deficits up out of his own pocket. Stokowski was 83 years old; he rehearsed the symphony for two months with special funding from the Rockefeller Foundation. The performance, with three conductors, was a landmark. Stokowski recorded the symphony shortly thereafter. On 1 May , a few weeks after Stokowski had celebrated his 90th birthday, Stokowski submitted his resignation to the Board of Directors of the American Symphony Orchestra. Stokowski had made plans to move to England where he had contacts in the recording industry at London-Decca and where he could continue to guest conduct the London Symphony Orchestra. He bought an old farmhouse in Nether Wallop and made plans for its renovations. Stokowski conducted New Philharmonia in which was to be his last performance for the public in England. He continued to make recordings. In he was in the process of building a house near St. The house was completed in and Stokowski spent time in France whenever he was not working on recordings in England. Stokowski died at his home in Nether Wallop, Stockbridge, Hampshire on 13 September at the age of 95 years. He had made more than twenty recordings since his 90th birthday and was studying the Rachmaninoff Symphony No. Stokowski was buried in a private ceremony in the Marylebone Cemetery in London. His friend and admirer former Prime Minister Edward Heath delivered the eulogy. Stokowski had a strong desire to make great music accessible to people in all walks of life and welcomed developments in recording technology, film, radio, and television which made this possible. In he published a book titled Music for All of Us in which he tried to introduce both his technical and spiritual understanding of music to the public. come from four sources: These date from ca. The Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia, where Stokowski had served as an early advisor to the Board and conductor of the Curtis Student Orchestra, received the collection on 8 May. Shortly afterwards, in the fall of , Curtis accepted the donation of Robert L. Other individuals made smaller donations of letters, memorabilia, photographs, and paintings of Stokowski to the Stokowski Collection at the Curtis Institute. In the Trustees of the Curtis Institute of Music decided to donate these scores and papers to the University of Pennsylvania, which holds the scores and papers of Philadelphia Orchestra conductor Eugene Ormandy and the scores and papers of contralto Marian Anderson. Although the amount of original correspondence the Leopold Stokowski Papers is small, some of it is of great interest. Stokowski, always forward looking, writes excitedly about his new venture, the All-American Youth Orchestra. Stokowski wrote to Eleanor Roosevelt in February to gain her support and interest in the South American tour he was planning with the All-American Youth Orchestra. There are also a few personal letters, including five letters from Stokowski to his daughter Sonya, dated to expressing his interest in her plans and his concern that her activities not be publicized for fear that she might be kidnaped in the aftermath of the Lindbergh baby kidnaping. He auditioned hundreds of young performers, rated them on a scale and made comments about their performance and potential. However, later programs of performances of Stokowski transcriptions are found here, dated , as the Stokowski transcriptions continue to be rented and performed by orchestras around the world. Several hundred photographs of Leopold Stokowski are preserved and arranged chronologically in two albums. Additional oversize photographs are located in Box 41 and map drawer Awards and memorabilia in the Leopold Stokowski Papers include the parchment scroll designed and executed by Violet Oakley which forms part of the Philadelphia Award given to Stokowski in by Edward W.

Over 50 Oblates took part in this congress which included the officially elected representatives from the various communities with their superiors together with and the superiors and representatives from the provincial delegations of Pakistan, Bangladesh, Korea and Japan. Derrick Vernon, the Superior of Pakistan delegation was the facilitator. The Oblate Congress began with the solemn opening Eucharist celebrated by Fr. Irwin Morais, the provincial superior. There were five main addresses. Provincial who presented the blueprint of contemplated action for the future. It was followed by the keynote address by Fr. It pointed out the various moments of change in the apostolate styles of oblate activities and the historical causes that created those paradigm shifts. The speaker also ventured into a vision for relevant ministries in the future. The third important presentation was done by Rt. Kumara Illangasinghe, the Anglican Bishop who had been invited by the Provincial Council to be the chairman of a three-member Committee that conducted an Independent survey of all the Oblates based in Colombo. It contained a synopsis of the various views, critiques, reactions and the proposals of all the Oblates who were consulted including those in the houses of formation. The Participants having scanned all the incredibly multiple ministries that are currently operative in the province including the commitments to the overseas delegations and foreign missions, came up with three central topics for congress dialogues: In addition to the Steering Committee headed by the facilitator, the congress members appointed a drafting committee and an implementation committee at the end of the congress to oversee and accompany the implementations regarding the above three areas of oblate life and apostolate for the coming three-year timeline. The Vision Statement says: The Mission Statement says: The five-day sessions witnessed moments of lively debate on matters that were both agreeable and those of a controversial nature but were marked always with opportunities for freedom of expression and views and anchored on a spirit of mutual understanding, respect and charity. The Postulator for the Cause of the Servant of God, Thomas Cardinal Cooray OMI announced to the Congress the good news of the closing of the diocesan phase of the Canonical Inquiry for his canonization and invited the oblates to join the prayer-campaign launched by the archdiocese of Colombo which is the promoter of the cause, for its success. As the Congress zeroed in on the vision and mission statements, there was an air of satisfaction of five days spent fruitfully in oblate community, sharing and serious planning. The feeling of trust in divine Providence and the accompanying maternal intercession of Mary Immaculate kept the Congress in good spirits and assured them of a very hopeful future in life and ministry.
