Then, I brought my students to the carpet and stated the objective. I said, "Today we are going to be learning about facts. Facts are things that can be proven to be true. It is important to learn about facts because when we write our expository pieces, as authors, we want our readers to learn something new. We do this by telling them facts about a topic. Yesterday we wrote some opinions about clouds. Today we are going to write facts about clouds. Not only did I focus on the text, I also pointed out the pictures and read the captions and labels so my students could gather information about the clouds. Remember, you need to speak in complete sentences. Remember, you need to speak in complete sentences as well. I wanted my students to really address standard SL1. I said, "Use details to describe what those clouds look like to your partner. How did the author describe each kind of cloud? Students were doing well and I wanted to point that out to students. I said, "Yesterday we talked about opinions and you used your clue words like "I feel I really like how you are telling your partner the facts that you are learning from the text. Remember, facts are statements that can be proven to be true, so keeping telling your partner the true things that you are learning about clouds. I really wanted to assess whether my students could pick out facts from a text and then write down the facts. I also wanted them to verbalize how they knew what they had written was a fact. I would say, "How do you know that what you wrote is a fact? You can see their discussion in a video here: You are going to get a paper. You will need to tell me 3 facts that you learned about clouds. We have been working hard to restate the question and use that as the first part of our answer. You will also need to make sure you write in complete sentences. When you are done with that, on the back side, you will need to write and tell me how you know what you have written are facts. Does everyone understand what to do? I circulated around the room, helping students if they needed it. I scaffolded my support with students, offering more support to the students who typically struggle with getting started on complex writing tasks. You can see how my students did and how I tried to question my students to help them arrive at the correct answers on their own by watching the video here:
