Early life[edit] Littlejohn was born in Ilford , Essex in He worked for local newspapers during the early s. From , he worked for the London radio station LBC , beginning with a regular opinion spot. He later became permanent presenter of the morning show, replacing Michael Parkinson. This culminated in the Radio Authority stating that he "had broken half-a-dozen rules and had incited violence" [18] due to an edition of his phone-in show in which he suggested the police should have used flamethrowers against a group of "militant homosexuals" protesting outside the House of Commons. Called Richard Littlejohn, the show ran for one year. It was not a success. The film director Michael Winner , a guest on the show, attacked Littlejohn for his views and told him that the two women "have come across with considerable dignity and you have come across as an arsehole". The programme was dropped on 8 July when Sky News changed format and replaced it with regular rolling news. Anthony Daniels, writing in The Daily Telegraph , said: Hysterically funny, wonderfully politically incorrect, [The New Statesman said of it: He spends much of the year writing from a gated mansion in Florida , and admitted in a recent column that, when he is in Britain, he rarely leaves the house. He is describing a country he sees only through the pages of the right-wing press and his self-reinforcing mailbag. Thirteen Years of Labour Madness -€” Publisher: I was unable to find fault with a single sentiment. Controversy and criticism[edit] Death of Lucy Meadows[edit] In December , Littlejohn wrote an article criticising the decision of Accrington teacher Lucy Meadows to return to the same school after undergoing gender reassignment surgery. Littlejohn cited concern for the sensibilities of the children and stated: In the same article he sympathised with those who were "trapped in a body of the wrong sex" and underwent gender reassignment operations, and expressed support for the operations being paid for by the NHS, provided it was for a genuine medical reason, but argued transgender people should not be teachers as it could upset children. Trans Media Watch , a charity for transgender people, said: In fact, the centre offers "support services for Asian women and their families on a wide range of issues including domestic violence , benefits , housing, education, immigration and health matters [and provided] advocacy and support to people with learning disabilities ". As Monroe had grown up in a home with foster children they are aware of the potential for harming him. Monroe tried unsuccessfully to negotiate flexible hours so they could work and look after their baby, but gave up their job so they could look after the child better. By being a very likeable person, and a very good writer, and a very good cook, [Jack Monroe] got herself a newspaper column and a book deal. Marina Hyde of The Guardian noted in This amounts to references in odd columns -€” an impressive increase on his total of 82 mentions. In his Daily Mail column on 10 October , he said, in reference to British society in the s: An apology was appended to the online version of the article [62] after the Daily Mail published an apology in the print version. Littlejohn stated that while he supported fostered children being brought up by loving, gay partners, as opposed to living in state institutions, he nonetheless adhered to his belief that children "benefit most from being raised by a man and a woman". Littlejohn came under widespread criticism for his comments, with many accusing him of homophobia. As a result, Center Parcs announced its decision to cease publication of its advertisements in the Daily Mail, with a number of other businesses also reviewing their decision to advertise in the newspaper. He starred in his own football video, We Woz Robbed. They have two children, Georgina b. On 6 July he wrote in the Daily Mail: When some people heard I was making the programme, their first reaction was: If I had been making a film about Islamophobia, no one would have asked me if I was Muslim. The Labour MP John Mann told me that he experienced exactly the same reaction when he instigated a parliamentary inquiry into anti-Semitism. But the implication was plainly that the very idea of anti-Semitism is the invention of some vast Jewish conspiracy. Jews have become more anxious and more vulnerable to attack than at any time for a generation or longer. After three months filming across Britain, I reached the conclusion: In an interview Littlejohn says: I was horrified with what I saw going on there. The bone of contention here, of course, was the state of Israel and its abhorrent treatment of Palestinians. Undoubtedly those on the left who express support for the rabidly anti-Israeli stance of Hizbollah and other pro-terror organisations are deeply hypocritical, if not unhinged. Politics and prejudice can, indeed must, be separated in this instance. Overall though, this was an excellent and provocative TV polemic that certainly left viewers with much to think about. Not only with regard to the sort of violence and hostility that most decent people would have thought to be largely a thing of the past but to smaller, more insidious things, too. How obscene is that? The BNP is at heart Jew-hating. Anti-Semitism is openly expressed in the Middle East. But then we knew that. To make that assertion, I assumed, he must have found some pretty juicy quotes from mainstream Leftists. Peter Wilby, the former editor of the New Statesman "who once foolishly published an anti-Zionist-looking cover and then apologised" posited an alternative theory. Not, of course, that I would accuse Littlejohn of impugning the motives of others. That would make him no better than a critic who thought his hunt for anti-Semitic Lefties was, in reality, a search for a stick "any stick" with which to beat the Left. Such a critic might as well accuse Channel 4 of trying to discredit a legitimate concern about the rhetoric used against Israel by employing a hack not quite up to the task.
