Maldonado is currently a predoctoral scholar. In this report, she had debunked the myth that single parent families in the United States are poor because they are not employed. Instead, they are poor being employed in low wage jobs, and it is the redistribution through social assistance that is failing single parents in the U. Discussing our findings, over the aforementioned chai latte, our separate research interests of family policies and single-parent families converged. Maldonado challenged Nieuwenhuis for his emphasis on coupled households: What about single mothers? Would you expect family policies to differently affect the outcomes of single- and two-parent families? In this paper, we found that single-parent families have substantially higher poverty rates than two-parent families across all countries. This is not a surprising finding. It is well established in the literature. Single-parent families have fewer resources than their two-parent counterparts. Our main contribution to the literature is our finding that family policies are beneficial for all families with children, and especially so for single-parent families. Longer parental leave, a smaller proportion of unpaid leave, and higher amounts of family allowances reduced poverty among all families, and to a greater extent among single-parent families. Paid leave more effectively facilitates the employment of single parents, thereby reducing their poverty risk. Moreover, family allowances reduce poverty among single parent families after taking into account important factors such as whether they are employed and how many hours they work. Single-parent families are less likely to be poor in countries that have family policies. The United States is the outlier. Indeed, this is sobering news because the data suggest that effective solutions have been developed, but these are not available in the U. Some argue that the U. The sample covered , households with children, in 18 OECD countries, from We invite theory-driven empirical studies on social policies that affect single-parent families. We encourage studies to address not only taxes and transfers but also other types of social policies, such as family policies, early child education, childcare, health care, employment and labor market regulations. In addition to studies that emphasise income poverty, we welcome those that examine various outcomes such as inequality, material deprivation, and child wellbeing. The call for papers is available on the conference website. Abstracts are due 10 March to the conference organisers.
