However, there are definitely still some features and improvements you may not be aware of. Apple Mail The Mail app is oft-ignored, with Mac users preferring to use third-party e-mail services instead. Delete e-mails by swiping the trackpad to the left and mark it unread by doing so in the opposite direction â€” note that you do both with two fingers. This uses multi-touch button technology. Click on the Compose button, then click outside the window and select Compose again. Whenever someone unfamiliar sends you an e-mail, Apple Mail can now give you the option to add them directly to your contacts list. The Mail app is now closely integrated with the Calendar app, giving you the option to quickly add appointments and events into your calendar. Photos The Photos app came with its own set of new features and improvements. There is an added category for screenshots. This is useful especially if you synced all of your devices together. Though most of us rarely upload screenshots, there are those who do so to brag about their in-game achievements or conversations they want uploaded on social on social media. It now features support for 3rd-party extensions â€” you can download these on the Mac App Store. In El Capitan, you can now change geo tags and other bits of metadata on the Photos app. While viewing an image, simply click on the info button and drag the location pin to a new area. Spotlight usage In El Capitan, looks like someone in Apple received the memo and made Spotlight smarter and in turn, more like Siri. What exactly is natural language and how do you do this? Learn more about it along with others here: First off, accessing it. The Spotlight search box is also movable, unlike in Yosemite. We have no idea why Apple only thought of this now. The natural search feature now allows Spotlight to conduct searches even if the user uses natural or conversational language. You can now use Spotlight to learn about the weather not only in your current location, but in those throughout the world. Search for sports scores. Arguably one of its most useful features, simply type in a major league team name and it will display the score of their most recent match and their next few games. So far, Spotlight has been fairly limited to domestic leagues, but it may be on its way to supporting international games. Split Screen mode Reminiscent of Microsoft Snap, the Split screen mode is a nifty feature which allows you to open two windows at the same time, seamlessly access two programs at the same time, and of course, multitask. This feature is apparently one of the biggest draws of El Capitan. To enter this mode, simply do the following: First off, choose which apps you want to run. Make sure BOTH applications â€” the ones you want to be on split screen â€” are already running. Once one app goes into split screen, you cannot launch another one. First off, click and hold on the green button on the left hand side of the Mail app and drag it either left or right. A blue background occupying half the screen will appear where you will drag the window. Drag the Mail app in any of those. If you want to resize one of the apps, simply click and drag the thin black bar separating them and drag left or right. It allows Mac users to transfer email entries into their calendars quickly, create a slideshows while using a word document as a reference, and watch a sports event via live stream while writing a story about it. This browser has always been behind Google Chrome and Mozilla Firefox. It has a few new features â€” here they are and how to use them: Airplay, stream videos from Safari to your Apple TV â€” to stream YouTube videos and ones from other video-sharing sites, simply look for the Airplay icon in compatible web videos, click it, and select the option to stream. Remember though, not all videos online can be streamed! Simply drag the tab to the left of your browser to pin it. They will stay active in the background and continue loading. An audio icon will show up on tabs with playing sounds â€” click on the icon to immediately mute the tab. You can also mute all other tabs in a single click as well. Share button â€” you can easily share anything you stumbled across the web through this, may it be via e-mail or to social networking websites like Facebook and Google. You can easily share something with with just a couple of clicks. The new Safari is also armed with developer kits to test website responsiveness and mobile compatibility and an improved reader mode. New Notes Features As Apple puts it: Not only can you sync your notes to all devices, you can now add different elements, including photos, links, videos, and PDFs on a single note by just dragging and dropping. You can also save content from other apps, like Safari and Calendar, to your note: Checklists, useful for reminders, shopping, and for keeping your workflow smooth, can be added in just a single click. The revamped Notes app also has the Attachments folder, wherein you can view all of the files you attached. This is extremely handy, considering that most of us lose track of the files we attach. These are divided into folders: Its best addition so far is giving users the ability to draw sketches, which can then be attached into any note. Other new features include a closer integration of the Calendar and Mail app, and transit data in Maps. You can also hide the Menu bar to make space "perfect for smaller MacBooks. Shake your mouse or rapidly stroke your trackpad to make your cursor larger.
