They were also transporting three members of Congress who traveled to the Philippines to observe the relief efforts: As they were preparing to land in Manila, they heard a mayday call from two pilots transporting relief supplies. One was American, the other German. But the situation got more complicated when the rest of their transmission was interrupted by another aircraft using the same frequency. An Australian C was in the area, Kauffman said, and he began communicating with that pilot who heard the full transmission. The Marines asked to cancel their approach in order to assist with the downed helo, Kauffman said, and one of the stranded pilots responded directly. They descended to 1,000 feet and got back in touch with the Australian pilot, who was at 10,000 feet. Kauffman told the Australian pilot they had a raft they could push out to the pilots in the water. The Marines got down to 1,000 feet and Kauffman slowed the aircraft speed to search for the crew. The Australian pilot remained overhead to assist with radio calls, and one of the pilots in the water had an emergency radio he was using to communicate, Kauffman said. The pilots had no water survival equipment either "no sea dye, no flares, no flotation devices. The entire crew, including the congressmen began scanning the water for a sign of the pilots, he said. Once they spotted them, they marked their position and refined their orbit pattern, he said. They descended to 1,000 feet and crew in the back of the aircraft began preparing to kick the raft out. So they asked him to again call out turns for another pass, and that one proved successful. They asked repeatedly that the coast guard provide an expected arrival time so they could get the pilots out of the water, but the information never came, Kauffman said. So they flew low over several fishing boats, flashing their lights in hope they would respond. Eventually a fishing boat headed in the direction of the downed pilots and pulled them aboard. Kauffman and his co-pilot, Capt. Chris Kim, were able to speak to them a few hours later. Their helicopter pitched over after hitting the water and sank almost immediately. The rescue also reaffirmed his faith, he said. I believe that God coordinated that rescue, and that part of the story is even more intriguing than the facts.
