And slow things are beautiful: The closing of day, The pause of the wave That curves downward to spray, The ember that crumbles, And the ox that moves on In the quiet of power. She was readily published. While there are many treasures among her books which deserve to be read anew, some seem more like short stories, or even prose poems, than developed novels. In her weakest writing, her plots are uneven and end abruptly. Still, in all her books, the characters are lively and the sense of place is strong. For example, the resolutions of The Place and Jon the Unlucky seem totally improbable, yet the characters and the perception of parallel cultures remain in the mind. I prefer her episodic books, like Trudy and The Tree House, inspired by a promised childhood tree house on Lake Erie which never came into being, or her long Sally series, which follows a surprising, courageous, girl from her childhood to young womanhood. Citing a lifelong problem in remembering words, she says "I have, quite deliberately, tried to make my writing clear, rather than rich. Some Recommended Books to which we will add These are personal remarks; we are not professional reviewers anyway and you might as well be able to spot our biases. If a favorite is not here, please suggest it. These five read well as one long book. The books are set just after the Revolution in a Maine of small coastal farms with the presence of the sea and the possibility of voyages to Europe and Africa ever present. Her gaiety and courage and resilience only grow stronger through the years. We would like to have known her. Away Goes Sally The family moves north on a little house drawn by oxen to a new farm overlooking the Penobscot. The father traces his son, and married into the close knit family. They arrive to find the French Revolution increasingly violent. Bound for Italy, intercepted by pirates, sold to a fierce, moody Sultan. Placed in the harem as a servant of the White Lalla, Sally makes plans to escape. Not the most realistic of books, but a lot of fun to read. Pierre appears, rich, handsome and charming. Andrew is jealous, and Sally chooses the one we thought she would.. The Enchanted - This weaves an Indian myth about people who change to or from animals into a simple story of a man who is restoring a farm in the Maine Woods. Characters are well drawn, it is evocative of place, and the clues to the myth are introduced by nuance; delicately written, and not overwritten, it makes a pleasant little story in which love redeems, possibly better suited for adults although accessible for some children. The Cat Who Went to Heaven, illustrated by Lynd Ward A neatly crafted story about a cat who longed to be included in the temple painting of the Artist. She will not invite her older sisters to the birthday party! She will not let them in her new house, only her parents! A funny, satisfying series of episodes in the life of a truly spoiled and naughty child, who always manages to show just enough redeeming kindness to keep the situation from becoming totally out of hand. A northern New York Pippi Longstocking! Then the perfect sweet Lab appears and settles in. The original owner comes to claim him, and, in an interesting ending, Owen lets the dog choose where he will live. The father gently teaches Jeddo the lessons and joys of life on the road. She often explores alone, accompanied by a droll goose named Livy. The past and present become intermingled for her and she knows that a Pawnee farm hand of her uncles descends from the ancient civilization and deserves the treasure she has found. Chicago and London; Macmillan, , St. Almost an Autobiography, Brattleboro, Vermont: Stephen Greene Press ; pp; index. Louise Seaman Bechtel Papers. Vassar Papers, bulk: These contain correspondence with Coatsworth, a personal friend. She headed the juvenile department at Macmillan Co.
