In he married Hester Long, daughter of a Protestant farmer of Roundwood, at the foot of the Wicklow mountains. Here Holt took up a farm and, as a trusted loyalist, held several minor local offices. About he joined the United Irishmen. Active during most of the rebellion he rallied the defeated rebels with skill and resource and organized guerrilla resistance. Hunted long but unsuccessfully, Holt eventually surrendered himself on 10 November on condition of his exile without trial to New South Wales. These lenient terms and some transactions while he was held awaiting transportation at Cork aroused suspicions that he had turned informer. After a lengthy delay Holt and his wife and son sailed from Cork in the Minerva on 24 August and arrived at Sydney Cove on 11 January. The authorities seem to have feared that Holt, an experienced rebel leader, would be a centre of disaffection, but nothing was farther from his plans. As a lower middle class Irish Protestant with firm notions of respectability Holt wanted to better his position by thrift and hard work. A good farmer, he met early reverses resulting from the vagaries of the Australian climate, but showed more capacity than many in New South Wales at that time. He was a useful manager for Cox and by was himself the owner of acres 85 ha, on which he grazed sheep and 50 cattle. Despite his vigorous protests Holt was thrice arrested for suspected complicity in plans for an Irish rising. In September he was denounced as a conspirator during a period of alarm. He was acquitted but was constrained to witness the brutal flogging of which he wrote a vivid account of two convicted offenders, Fitzgerald and Galvin. On Christmas eve he was haled before Atkins on a false accusation of plotting his murder, but was again cleared. Three months later, however, he was detained after the Castle Hill rising and transported to Norfolk Island, where he remained until November. Nevertheless he seems to have held aloof from conspiracies, having a lively fear of informers and something of a contempt for the amateurish tactics of the disaffected Irish Catholics. Returning to his farm, Holt met no further trouble except the confiscation of an illicit still in. He became a publican in Dublin but found his custom affected by old feuds. In he retired to Dunleary Dun Laoghaire where, lamenting that he had left New South Wales, he lived on the rents of several houses until his death on 16 May. He left a daughter and two sons, Joshua b. Undoubtedly he was resolute and able, with qualities of leadership, although perhaps not quite so resourceful in deed and repartee as his memoirs suggest.

Holt, upon marrying Hester Long [maternally of the Manning "Oranger" family] in , set himself up as a farmer in the vicinity of Roundwood. He joined the Irish Volunteers in the s and held a number of minor public offices such as an inspector of wool and cloth but became involved in law enforcement as a sub-constable , billet master for the militia and a bounty hunter. Holt then took to the Wicklow mountains, gradually assuming a position of prominence with the United Irish, mostly Catholic, rebels. Avoiding pitched battles, Holt led a fierce campaign of raids and ambushes against loyalist military targets in Wicklow , striking at will and reducing government influence in the county to urban strongholds. Emerging to meet them, Holt was given much of the credit for the planning of the ambush and defeat of a pursuing force of British cavalry at Ballyellis on 30 June However, the subsequent Midlands campaign to revive the rebellion was a disaster, and Holt was lucky to escape with his life back to the safety of the Wicklow Mountains. Eluding a number of large-scale sweeps into the mountains by the army following the collapse of the rising, Holt together with his younger rebel Captain Michael Dwyer , tied down thousands of troops and his forces were augmented by a steady supply of recruits, a significant proportion of whom were deserters from the militia. Dublin Castle was eager to end the rebellion in Wicklow and allow him exile after incarceration in the Bermingham Tower without trial in New South Wales. He always claimed in Australia that he was a political exile and not a convict. In September he was arrested on suspicion of being concerned in a plot against the government, but was soon afterwards released as no evidence could be found against him. He was successful in his management for Cox, and afterwards bought land for himself which eventually yielded him a competence. In when the Castle Hill uprising occurred Holt, who was not involved, had been warned that evening that it was about to happen. He was nonetheless afterwards hounded by Governor King and many false witnesses brought against him. Although there was no plausible evidence at all against him, he was in April exiled by King to Norfolk Island , and there put to hard labour. Whereas other histories merely describe Foveaux as some able and efficient administrator who became Lieutenant-Governor at Norfolk Island, Holt saw him far less blandly than that. Holt graphically described Foveaux as the greatest tyrant that he Holt had ever known. Holt described the joy of the inhabitants of Norfolk Island on the day when Foveaux departed. He wrote in his Memoirs Edited by Croker, Pardon[edit] In June Holt received a free pardon, but as this had been given after the arrest of Governor Bligh , it had to be handed in to the government when Governor Macquarie arrived. Holt, however, was officially pardoned on 1 January and in December , having sold some of his land and stock, with his wife and younger son took passage to Europe on the Isabella; also on board was Henry Browne Hayes. The ship was wrecked by a reef so the passengers and crew were landed at Eagle Island one of the Falkland Islands , and Holt showed great resolution and ingenuity in making the best of the conditions on the island. He was rescued on 4 April but did not reach England until 22 February as he went via the United States. Holt retired to Ireland where he lived for the rest of his life, but regretted he had left Australia. He was a man of great courage and force of character, a good leader of men.
