"A Mind Beside Itself" is a three-part song cycle composed of "Erotomania", "Voices" and "The Silent Man". Portnoy stated that the instrumental "Erotomania" was written "off the cuff" as "a bit of a joke and parody".

Caumsett Hidey ho again neighbors I might have something interesting to say today seeing as how it is shaping up to be a very beautiful day thank you Last week I was walking along the shoreline of the Long Island Sound trying not to think much at all as thinking usually only complicates and frustrates me when I allow myself to engage in it for very long. All I wanted out of the moment was the chance to simply be in the moment. In the midst of this I was overcome by a very vivid memory. It is a memory that I have carried with me in all its technicolor glory for most of my life. I remembered being a young lad of perhaps around seven or eight years old. A far cry from the world weary and wizened old gentleman you see before you now. Quite a packed house. This particular memory took place on a rare afternoon when I found myself in the house alone. Right from the opening bars of the song and a camera shot of Ms. Sadness in particular brought upon by loss. In particular the loss of love. Now, having had only about seven or eight years on this fine planet among the rest of you humans I had not at least to my knowledge or awareness experienced any great loss. I certainly again at least to my knowledge or awareness experienced any great loss of love. As far as I knew in my own life the only love I knew was that of my family, certainly not the romantic boy-girl love depicted as so painful and deep in the song. Thinking about what it must be like to be deeply in love and to have that love disappear or go away or turn on me like it seemed to in the song. I wanted to be that person staring out that window. I craved to know what that really felt like. To have the memories in my own mind of the events that led up to that moment. If I could have mustered up tears on cue the waterworks would have been flowing that was how lost in this manufactured sadness I became for those five and a half minutes. This, while it may not be the actual beginning is my earliest memory of something that would recur again and again in my life in various ways. A secret emotional life if you will, for this was something I kept completely to myself and never shared with another human being for a very long time. For now I will leave that there to marinate as it will
