Pickering has eschewed publicity raised by the film and has since regarded the unorthodoxy of his classroom behavior as more goalless than that depicted in Dead Poets Society, in which unorthodoxy is employed deliberately as a way to preach the values of non-conformity and carpe diem. Instead, Pickering has commented that "I did such things not so much to awaken students as to entertain myself. Visiting writer Scott Sanders] talked about all the tools he could use in the books. They were very nice people. People who used tools thought that things could be made and fashioned to last. He thought I was a complete savage and a fascist at that. A Fulbright recipient, Pickering has lectured in classrooms in Jordan and Syria , and has held research posts at the University of Western Australia as well as the University of Edinburgh.
